PREFACE.

THE main object of this work, as stated in the preface to the original edition, is to facilitate the study of Case Law, by presenting to the inquirer, in a form convenient for reference, the history of the various cases that have been adversely discussed or specially considered in the English and other Courts.

A mere alphabetical list of cases, however complete, would have been obviously insufficient by itself to carry out this purpose. For instance, a case of A. v. B. may have been disapproved in a case of M. v. N., and subsequently that very case of M. v. N. may have been questioned in the case of X. v. Y., and so on. No alphabetical list could have shown this at a glance without numerous and confusing cross-references. We have therefore in the body of the work arranged the cases in the form of a Digest according to their subject-matter, and have, in many instances, given such extracts from the judgments as will show the special point discussed in each case. We have thus collected together under their proper headings those cases in which a given case is specially discussed, approved, &c., and have so arranged them that the inquirer may see at once not only how that case itself has been treated, but also how the cases treating it have been themselves subsequently handled. It has been found impossible to refine very much in the matter of classification, and we have generally been content to gather the cases under one comprehensive heading with here and there a sub-division.

• By the aid of the Appendix all cases actually overruled, questioned, or reversed to the end of 1906 have been included, though it has not been found possible to bring all cases dealt with in a less important manner down to that recent date.

• The name of each of the cases dealt with or commented upon is printed in heavy or Clarendon type, and the name of each of the cases dealing with or commenting upon any of these cases is printed in light or ordinary Roman type. Where several cases in succession are printed in heavy type they are all dealt with in the next following case in ordinary type.

Every case, whether it be a case commented upon, or a commenting case, has its date given, and also the Court or judge by whom it was decided.

Where a case appears in more than one series of legal reports, the references to all the series are given.

The precise mode in which each case commented upon has been dealt with in the commenting cases has so far as possible been indicated. With regard to overruled cases the principle has almost invariably been adopted that no case is overruled until a Court has definitely said so.

It is estimated that about 30,000 cases are more or less completely dealt with in the work.

In addition to English cases there are a considerable number of Irish and Scotch cases.

The original intention was that the work should be limited to one volume; and until it had been decided to enlarge its size the saving of space was an important consideration. In the earlier part of the work, therefore, whenever a series of cases occurred in which each case treated of some or all of the cases which preceded it, the cases commented upon were generally dealt with in groups. The result has been that in the part of the work in question several cases in heavy type are not infrequently superimposed upon the same commenting case; and that where the name of a case commented upon appears in some only of the consecutive groups, gaps sometimes intervene between its successive appearances, even causing it to extend over several columns. If, however, in these instances, the reader will bear in mind the simple rule, above stated, that each case in heavy type is dealt with in the next case in ordinary type, and will observe that, when a case extends beyond one column, the table of cases indicates each column in which it occurs, he will find no difficulty in following out these cases.

Our special thanks are due to Mr. John Mews, of the Middle Temple, who made several useful suggestions at the outset of the work, and whose Annual Digests have been indispensable to the performance of our task.

We also gratefully acknowledge assistance received from time to time from Mr. A. B. Randall, of Lincoln's Inn.

The alphabetical table of cases has been compiled by Mr. Digby L. F. Koe, of Gray's Inn, to whom we desire to express our indebtedness.

We have freely availed ourselves of the libraries of the Four Inns of Court. We have also derived great advantage from our continuous use of the Inns of Court Bar Library at the Royal Courts of Justice, where the careful noting up of the reports by the librarian, Mr. R. Riches, has enabled us to add numerous cases of whose existence we could not otherwise have known.

POLLOCK, C.D.—If Cumber v. Wane was law, and a binding authority upon us, undoubtedly we could not come to a conclusion in favour of the defendant. That case was indubitatus assumpsit for 5*l.*, to which the defendant pleaded that he gave the plaintiff a promissory note for 5*l.* in satisfaction, and that the plaintiff received it in satisfaction, and it was held, on writ of error, after judgment for the plaintiff, that the plea was ill. It does not appear from the report whether the note was payable presently, or whether it was negotiable or not. The facts are not sufficiently stated to make it a binding authority. Pratt, C.J., says, in delivering the judgment of the Court, "As the plaintiff had a good cause of action it can only be extinguished by a satisfaction he agreed to accept; and it is not his agreement alone that is sufficient, but it must appear to the Court to be a reasonable satisfaction. or, at least, the contrary must not appear, as it does in this case. If 5*l.* be, as is admitted, no satisfaction for 15*l.*, why is a simple contract to pay 5*l.* a satisfaction for another simple contract of three times the value? In the case of a bond, another has never been allowed to be pleaded in satisfaction, without a bettering of the plaintiff's case, as by shortening the time of payment." From the latter part of the judgment I must, with every respect for the great authority of that learned judge, express my dissent. Undoubtedly at that time it was not law; for in Finnel's Case it was laid down as clear matter of law, that, in the case of a bond for 500*l.*, due on the 1st of January, if the obligee accepted 100*l.* in satisfaction the day before, he was at liberty to do so; and the Court never inquired whether the satisfaction was reasonable; they left it to the agreement of the parties. Besides which, it does not appear in Cumber v. Wane that the promissory note was negotiable, and therefore that the plaintiff had any benefit from it. The marginal note of that case is:—"Giving a note for 5*l.* cannot be pleaded as a satisfaction for 15*l.*" and was expressly denied to be law by Lord Ellenborough, in argument, in Heathcote v. Crookshanks, and Buller, J., referred to a case of Hardcastle v. Howard (1786), in which it had been so denied to be law. But whether Cumber v. Wane have been overruled or not, it appears to me that it cannot be sustained as an authority that the acceptance of a negotiable security may not be a satisfaction of a claim to a larger amount.—p. 321.

PARKER, B.—In Thomas v. Heathorn it does not appear to have been a case of accord and satisfaction, although the bill accepted by the defendant was a negotiable security; it does not appear that it was given by way of satisfaction.—p. 321. ALDRIDGE and PLATT, B.B. agreed.

SELBORNE, J.O.—The question, therefore, is, nakedly raised by this appeal whether your lordships are now prepared not only to overrule, as contrary to law, the doctrine stated by Sir E. Coke to have been laid down by all the judges of the C. P. in Pinnel's Case in 1602, and repeated in his note to Littleton, sect. 314, but to treat a prospective agreement not under seal for satisfaction of a debt, by a series of payments on account to a total amount less than the whole debt, as binding in law, provided those payments are regularly made—the case not being one of a composition with a common debtor, agreed to inter se by several creditors. I prefer so to state the question, instead of treating it (as it was put at the bar) as depending on the authority of Cumber v. Wane, decided in 1718. It may well be that distinctions which in later cases have been held sufficient to exclude the application of that doctrine existed and were inappropriately disregarded in Cumber v. Wane, and yet that the doctrine itself may be law, rightly recognised in Cumber v. Wane, and not really contradicted by any later authorities. And this appears to me to be the true state of the case. The doctrine itself, as laid down by Sir E. Coke, may have been criticised as questionable in principle by some persons whose opinions are entitled to respect, but it has never been judicially overruled, on the contrary I think it has always, since the sixteenth century, been accepted as law. If so, I cannot think that your lordships would do right, if you were now to reverse as erroneous a judgment of the C. A. proceeding upon a doctrine which has been accepted as part of the law of England for 280 years. The doctrine, as stated in Pinnel's Case, is, "that payment of a lesser sum on the day" (it would of course be the same after the day), "in satisfaction of a greater, cannot be any satisfaction for the whole, because it appears to the judges that by no possibility a lesser sum can be a satisfaction to the plaintiff for a greater sum." As stated in Coke on Littleton (212 b), it is, "where the condition is for payment of 20l, the obligor or feoffee cannot at the time appointed pay a lesser sum in satisfaction of the whole, because it is apparent that a lesser sum of money cannot be a satisfaction of a greater," adding (what is beyond controversy) that an acquittance under seal in full satisfaction of the whole would (under like circumstances) be valid and binding. . . . All the authorities subsequent to Cumber v. Wane which were relied upon by the appellant at your lordships' bar—such as Schree v. Tripp, Curieus v. Clark and Godard v. O'Brien—have proceeded upon the distinction that, by giving negotiable paper or otherwise, there had been some new consideration for a new agreement, distinct from mere money payments in or towards discharge of the original liability. I think it unnecessary to go through those cases, or to examine the particular grounds on which each of them was decided. There are no such facts in the case now before your lordships. What is called "any benefit, or even any legal possibility of benefit," in Mr. Smith's notes to Cumber v. Wane, is not, as I conceive, that sort of benefit which a creditor may derive by getting payment of part of the money due to him from a debtor who might otherwise keep him at arm's length or possibly become insolvent, but is some independent benefit, actual or contingent, of a kind which might in law be a good and valuable consideration for any sort of agreement not under seal.—p. 132.

LORD BLACKBURN, after discussing the earlier cases, said.—I must observe that, whether Cumber v. Wane was, or was not decided to be law in Harrieston v. Howard, it certainly was denied to be law in Schree v. Tripp, and that, though it is quite true that Pinnel's Case, as far as regards the points actually raised in the case, has not only never been questioned, but is often assented to, I am not aware that in any case before Fitch v. Sutton, unless it be Cumber v. Wane, has that part of it which I venture to call the dictum ever been acted upon, and, as I have pointed out, had it not been for the composition with other creditors, there could have been no defence in Fitch v. Sutton, whether the dictum in Pinnel's Case was right or wrong.—p. 137.

LORD WATSON.—I do not think it necessary to consider whether it would still be open to this House, if so advised, to overrule the doctrine in Cumber v. Wane and Pinnel's Case, because I am not prepared to disturb that doctrine.—p. 138.

LORD FITZGERALD, who also concurred, after referring to the resolution in Pinnel's Case, discussed Drughda Corporation v. Fairclough, and said.—The question did arise directly in that case, but the plea failed on other points, and it was, therefore, not necessary actually to decide it. I refer to it as showing how a judge of great experience [Lefroy, C.J.] considered the law to stand. . . . I should hesitate before coming to a decision which might be a serious intrusion upon that rule, but I concur with Lord Blackburn that it would have been wiser and better if the resolution in Pinnel's Case had never been come to, and there had been no occasion for the long list of decisions supporting composition with a creditor on the rather artificial consideration of the mutual consent of the other creditors.—p. 141.

COTTON, L.J.—All that Lord Selborne decided there [Foskes v. Beer] (and none of the other lords who delivered their opinions differed from it) was that, looking at the words of the agreement, which was reduced into writing in that case, it could only be taken as an agreement to receive the sum mentioned, and the instalments mentioned, in consideration of the principal sum therein mentioned, and nothing more, and that to give it a different construction would be to add to that written agreement, which apparently fully expressed the intention of the parties, words which were not there, and to add to those words these words, "interest on those sums." That is an entirely different matter. What is the agreement between the parties here, as shown by the acts to which I have referred? In my opinion that agreement was to give up all claims in respect of all matters mentioned in the certificates. But then we come to another point which was entered into very fully by Stirling, J. [in the Court below] Was there a consideration? Now, I think the law is generally reasonable, but whether Cumber v. Bone was reasonable we have not to consider. An exception to the rule there laid down has been made by judges, whose decisions we ought not to disregard here by making further exceptions, which will reduce that case to something like principle. They lay down thus—that though the payment of a smaller sum cannot be a good consideration for accord and satisfaction of a claim for a larger one, yet if there is anything which can be a new consideration and a new benefit to the person entitled to the larger sum, that will do. . . . These cases . . . do go particularly to this—that if there is a promissory note, a negotiable instrument, for a smaller sum, that may do. The first of the cases relied upon on this point goes to this—that even if it is a promissory note signed by the party who is liable for the larger sum, that will do. That here that is not the case. Here the solicitors themselves gave their cheque for this amount.—p 301

CRANWORTH, L.C.—No doubt the duke ought not to have had an account for a longer period than he could have had the value at law, from the time his title accrued. I confess that in this case Drummond v. St. Alban's (Duke) cannot be explained by some doctrine of that sort, I do think it does not square with the other authorities, and cannot be considered as law.—p. 589. KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J. agreed.

FRY, J.—What is the authority adduced to me in support of this contention? It is a passage in 1 Mudd. Ch. P., which is in these words:—"Where one party is allowed to surcharge and falsify, the other may do so too." And it is suggested that this liberty asked to improve his own accounts is a liberty to the defendant to surcharge his own accounts. It does not seem to me to be a felonious mode of expression, as to improving his accounts, to say that he may surcharge himself. To call an undercharge a surcharge, or to call a credit a debit, seems to me to be a suggestion to which I can hardly listen. It appears to me, therefore, that this passage can have nothing whatever to do with it, and, if it means anything with regard to the ordinary rule of taking accounts, it means this: that where there are cross accounts between the plaintiff and defendant, and the plaintiff obtains leave to surcharge the other accounts, a similar right would be given in respect of the cross accounts. It is quite clear to my mind that no such liberty as is now sought for could with propriety be expressed as liberty to the other side to surcharge and falsify. The authority, which is only that of an anonymous case unreported, and the short effect of which is stated in this passage, certainly does not lead me to suppose it ever has been the practice in the Court of Chancery to do anything of the sort. I decline, therefore, to do it.—p. 156.

At the same time I lay so much stress in it, that, as he acted as his own solicitor, I consider him bound to account as another man who was his solicitor, and whom, in the cautious discharge of his duty as administrator, he vigilantly watched, would be.—p. 117.

ST. LEONARDS, L.C.—In Eyre v. Marsden it was held that the accumulations were not within the exceptions of the Act, as the grandchildren, for whom the portions were to be raised, were not children of any person taking an interest under the will. Now, independently of the reason given by Lord Langdale, I should have been clearly of opinion that if the grandchildren's parents had been provided for by the will, the case would have been within the provisions of the statute . . . In Shaw v. Rhodes, Bosanquet, J. . . was not, as I think, giving any opinion as to what was a sufficient interest in the parents, but whether the provision for the children was in the nature of a portion, so as to bring the case within the exception of the Act. When that case came before the H. L. . . there is no doubt that during the argument the opinions of the two judges were, that the smallest interest given to the parents of the children was sufficient. Here the sums are clearly portions, and the case is untouched by decision.—p. 8.

BENBOWELL, L.C.—WICKENS, V.-C., when the case came before him in 1871, intimated an opinion that the rule in *Scanderv. I have carefully considered the reasons which he adduced for this opinion with the respect due to any opinion of that learned judge, and certainly with no indisposition to give effect to the intention of the testator if I could see my way to do so. But I am unable to find any sound basis upon which a distinction can be rested in this respect between bequests to charities and those made in favour of individual beneficiaries.—p. 372. ALVERSTONE, M.C.—In the first place I would point out that Lord Davey and the other law lords who addressed the House undoubtedly had not the least intention of overruling Weatherall v. Thornburgh. Lord Davey cites it at the end of his judgment, and distinguishes it from the case which was before the House; but I think the real answer was probably given by counsel for the respondents in the course of their argument, that in Wharton v. Masterman or Harbin v. Masterman the persons who were entitled to the annuities had no interest whatever in the surplus, and therefore there was not any direction, so to speak, to accumulate except for the benefit of the person who was to become entitled, so that the principle of Scanderv. Vastey applied. There being no interest of the annuitants in the surplus, the persons entitled became entitled to the surplus, and therefore, the accumulations for them being directed for too long a period, they were entitled to come to the Court and say it ought to be theirs at the end of the twenty-one years. I think Wharton v. Masterman in no way intended to overrule or overrule Weatherall v. Thornburgh, and that as in Weatherall v. Thornburgh, where the Court came to the conclusion that there was no direction in the face of the will as to what was to be done with the income between the end of the twenty-one years and the death of the tenant for life—in other words, that the beneficiary was not intended to be given the income until after the death of the wife—so we must also in this case hold that, with regard to the surplus income between the expiration of twenty-one years and the death of Mrs. Greatorox, the cousins and the charity are not entitled to that income.—p. 607. TRAVIS, J.—One difficulty has arisen in consequence of a supposed observation of the judge in a case of Danson, in re, decided by Chitty, L.J. when Chitty, J., where he is reported as saying: "It is not in my view possible to say that the terms used in the [Interpretation] Act of 1889 import 'money to be laid out in the purchase of land' that could only be effected by an express definition clause 'Land,' therefore, in the definition of the Interpretation Act, means 'corporeal hereditaments' That definition I read into the Act now before me, whose words I consequently find to mean that which they would naturally at first sight appear to mean." The expression was not necessary for the determination of the case, because, as was pointed out by the learned judge there, you might have a permanent investment in consols by virtue of the provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and the decision would be just as good if the judge had said it meant corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments. I think it would be too strong to import into the report of this judgment the meaning sought to be put on it—namely, that land within the meaning of the Accumulations Act, 1892, must mean corporeal hereditaments. The judgment was not corrected by the judge, and I think there must be a slip in the report—p. 615.

 KENYON, C.J.—The case in Salkeld, which is the only authority cited in support of the objection to this implication, does not come very strongly recommended. For first, it is an anonymous case, and next, what is relied upon as there said was beside the point in judgment.
 It was rightly decided, that as against a wrongdoer the defendant might justify upon his possession, which was admitted by the defendant;
 but Lord Holt is made further to say, that which cannot be admitted, that where the action is transitory, as in that case, for taking the cattle, the plaintiff is foreclosed from pretending a right to the place, and that it cannot be contested

WILLIAMS, J.—If the animal has such vicious propensity, and the owner knows of it, he is bound to take such care as he would of an animal which is fero nature, because it forms an exception to his class. In some of the books I find expressions falling from judges which I am at a loss to appreciate. Holt, C.J. says, in Mason v.
Keeling, that there is "a great difference between horses and oxen,—in which a man has valuable property, and which are not so familiar to mankind,—and dogs, the former the owner ought to confine, and take all reasonable caution that they do no mischief, otherwise an action will be against him; but otherwise of dogs, before he has notice of some mischievous quality." I cannot see what difference it can make whether the animal is or is not one in which a man may have a valuable property.—p. 439

CAVE, J.—The strongest case on behalf of the appellant was that of the linnets (Alpin v.
Pagett). These linnets were originally wild, but they were caught and so tame as to be

CAVE, J.—Mr. Colam on behalf of the appellant relied on Colam v. Pagett, where it was held that linnets kept in captivity and trained as decoys for the purpose of bird-catching were "domestic animals", but there it was shown that the linnets were trained to perform a particular service, which cannot be correctly asserted of the scallig in the present case. The decision in Harper v. Marcks, where it was held that performing hons kept in a cage were not "domestic animals" within the meaning of the same Acts (Cruelty to Animals Acts, 1840 and 1884), is a strong authority against the conclusions put forward on behalf of the present appellant—p. 168. WRIGHT, J. concurred.

be there said that the memorial was false. But here it is not false. If, however, that case had not been distinguishable from this, I do not think the judges would be baird by so very recent a decision upon this recent statute, from allowing the true interpretation. . Denn v Dupuis, in the K. B., and the former case of Parling v Parkhurst, in the C. P., are of no weight on the present occasion, the former was decided on the authority of the case now pending, and that case was determined on a mere motion, because we would not overturn the decision of the Court of K. B., in that case, too, the principle was abandoned by the plaintiff's counsel, who merely endeavoured to distinguish the case from that of Denn v Dupuis without success. JAMES, L.J.—In Tench v. Cheese, a testator gave his real and personal estate to trustees, in trust to pay an annuity to M. P. S. and, if she should have children, to raise 4,000*l.* for the younger children. Upon consideration of Boughton v Boughton, the Court held that the rule in Roberts v. Walker (1880) 1 Russ. & M. 762.—LEACH, M.R., did not apply. One or two expressions of the L.C. and Turner, L.J. were relied upon in support of the contention of the appellant in this case. One was an expression used by the L.C. who said there was a "direction to self," and Turner, L.J. used these words "The mere fact of the real and personal estate being given together does not constitute them a mixed fund for the payment of debts, legacies, or annuities; but in order to effect that purpose, there must be a direction for the sale of the real estate, so as to throw the two funds absolutely and inevitably together to answer the common purposes of the will." From that it was contended that the case establishes as a rule of law that there must be an absolute conversion out and out. Now that was not really necessary for the decision of that case, and the distinction between an absolute direction and a discretionary power to sell was not before their lordships, and I do not understand that case as laying it down that the only case in which this exception from the general rule is to be found, is where there has been a direction to convert the real estate. Otherwise the rule would exclude a case in which a testator says expressly that he means his real estate to be the primary fund. There must be other modes of ascertaining whether that is the intention. The decision was simply that where there is a mere gift of real and personal estate together, that fact alone does not constitute them a mixed fund for the payment of legacies or annuities. It appears to me that that case does not compel us to say there must be an absolute conversion in order to bring the case within the meaning of the rule in Roberts v. Walker. . . . I think that decision [Falkner v. Grace] was quite right, because the gift was of a moiety of the estate, which in my opinion would be exactly the same thing as a gift out of a share. It stands in the same way as a gift out of a specific portion, and therefore that case is unaffected by Tench v. Cheese. . . . Bedford v. Bedford was a case where the property was given for the purpose of answering the immediate object with an ultimate direction to sell. That is a sufficient indication of an intention to make it a mixed fund, and that decision is not inconsistent with Tench v. Cheese.—p. 574. MELLISH, L.J. agreed.

FRY, J.—In my opinion the annuitant is entitled to receive her annuity out of the rents and profits accruing, not merely during her life but afterwards. There is no limitation of time expressed for the application of the rents and income for the benefit of the testator's wife, and the will contains no direction that any residue of the rents and income shall, during the life of the testator's widow, be paid to anyone else, though it provides generally that any residue shall be paid to the testator's sister with remainder to her children. The only difficulty which I feel in coming to this decision arises from Stelfox v. Sugden, which was very properly pressed upon me by Mr. Dunning, but I do not think it is conclusive in his favour, otherwise I should follow it. In that case there was a bequest of an annuity out of rents and income as in this case, but the will provided for the destination of the surplus during the life of the annuitant, which was the ground on which the annuity was decided to be a charge on the income only.—p. 168.

TRITTO, L.C.—It might seem from some of the expressions used by Lord Cottenham in Stokes v. Heron, that if an annuity has duration beyond the life of the first taker, without any limit expressly assigned to that duration, no other period can be fixed for its duration short of perpetuity. This, however, would be contrary to his own decision in Blewitt v. Roberts, and to the decision in Hedges v. Harpur. In Blewitt v. Roberts a testator gave to his wife 600l. per annum during her life, and after her death the said annuity to be divided. . . . The V.-C. held that the bequest passed the capital of the fund producing the annuities; but the L.C. (whether rightly, I think it may be fairly doubted) reversed the decision, and held that life annuities only were given. . . . These decisions are in accordance with the rule laid down by Lord Hardwicke in Savery v. Dyer, although, indeed, it was not necessary for the purpose of the decision, he then laid it down as a rule that, "if one gives by will an annuity, not existing before, to A." (that is, an annuity not existing at the date of the will, but created by the will), "A. shall have it only for life."—p. 540.

FRY, J.—In the first place, it has been suggested that a gift to A for life with remainder to B, is a gift of an annuity to B in perpetuity, because the limitation is expressed in the one case, and is not expressed in the other. And undoubtedly that appears to be the view which was entertained by Malins, V.C., in Evans v. Walker. He there said this "I understand the law to be that when there is a gift of an annuity to one for life, or to several for lives, and then a gift afterwards to another person, without any restriction, that means that the last taker is to have the capital from which the annuity was produced. In my view, that statement of the law is inconsistent with the earlier cases of Dunnett v. Roberts, Lett v. Randall, and others, and cannot, I think, be insisted upon as the view which has been adopted by the Court for many years in the construction of gifts of annuities. Those cases appear to me to decide that the mere want of limitation in the last gift of the annuity does not import that the annuitant is to take anything more than for life, and for that there is a very good reason. The duration of the life of the first taker is expressed not for the purpose of limiting the gift to the first taker, but of limiting the commencement of the gift to the second or the successive takers, and, therefore, the principle of expressio unius est exclusio alterius does not apply. Therefore, I think that the argument on that ground fails.—p. 297.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I cannot help thinking that in Bent v. Cullen (supra, col. 18) the L.C. (Lord Hatherley) did for a moment fail to observe the difference between giving a person a portion of the income of a fund and something payable out of it. . . I do not think Lord Hatherley throws any doubt at all on the soundness of the view expressed more recently by Fry, J., in Blight v. Hartnoll that if an annuity is a charge as distinguished from a gift of a portion of the fund, the annuity is not a perpetual annuity.—p. 228.

LOPPS, L.J.—But I do find that Bent v. Cullen, although it has been subsequently referred to, is a case about which very little has been said.

It appears to be a decision which has been repeatedly avoided. There has been, it appears to me, rather a desire in no way to deal with it.—p. 230.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The only doubt I have had has been by reason of the great authority of Lord Hatherley in Bent v. Cullen, for it is apparent to anyone who reads this will and then reads the will in that case that the two cases are uncommonly like each other. There are, however, differences in this will which have been pointed out. First of all, the annuitants in this will are put in a bunch, and some of them are, clearly to demonstration, not intended by the testator to take more than an annuity for life. It is said that the others do take more than an annuity for life—that they take an annuity for perpetuity. That state of things Lord Hatherley had not before him in the will which he then had to construe. Bent v. Cullen, as it has been pointed out, has not been acted upon, and whether it is right or wrong I really do not know, but it lays down no canon of construction.—p. 232.

MALL, V.C.—The next question, which is the important one, is whether the annuity determined when the youngest child attained twenty-one, and it is upon the authorities a question of very considerable difficulty, the judgments and views of the V.C. of England and of Wood, V.C., being apparently opposed to one another. Wood, V.C., considered that a gift for maintenance or education would of itself convey to the mind that it was only to last during minority, though not actually in terms so confined. That, I think, must be taken to be his view, from Gardner v. Barber. On the other hand, the view of the V.C. of England in Soames v. Martin seems to have been different. He considered that there was nothing to confine a provision for a person's maintenance and education to the minority of that person. It was given for two purposes—maintenance and education; and while maintenance would certainly last beyond minority, education would not necessarily cut with minority. I have already said what was Wood's, V.C., view in Gardner v. Barber. I think it plain, from the observations made by Wood, V.C., in commenting upon the decision of the V.C. of England in Soames v. Martin, that Wood's, V.-C., decision in Gardner v Barber was greatly influenced by what he supposed Lord Camden to have said in Knapp v. Jagers. It was, however, pointed out to me by Mr Graham Hastings in the course of the argument, and I quite agree, that that was an entire fallacy. When Lord Camden said "maintenance and education are confined to minority," he was, as I consider, nicely referring to the terms of the will then before him, being such that in that particular case they were so confined, and was not laying down any general rule that maintenance and education in such a clause or provision would ordinarily and per se determine with minority. I have thus pointed out what my view would be in such a case as the present if it were unaffected by authority, and I have also adverted to what appears to have been the mistake of Wood, V.-C., as to the judgment of Lord Camden. Under these circumstances, and considering especially that there was a context in Gardner v Barber, it appears to me that I am not bound by the decision in that case, and I think that the decision of the V.-C. of England in Stewart v. Chambers is a sound and good decision, more strictly applicable to the case before me, and therefore I adopt and follow that decision in this case.—p. 571.

KEKEWICH, J.—Carr v. Ingleby is reported only as a note to Wroughton v. Colquhoun. There is a statement of facts, and this, with the order, which is set out at length, justifies what is said in Seton on Decrees (5th ed. vol. ii. p. 1884), but there is no report of argument or judgment, and to this extent the case is unsatisfactory as a guide, standing as it does alone. I have found some later cases in which it is cited, but in none of them is there any comment on it, and the only case which it appears to have influenced is Gratrix v. Chambers, where Stuart, V.-C., held that a provision as to forfeiture of an annuity prevented the application of Wroughton v. Colquhoun. That decision is open to two observations regarding the case in hand—first, there was no valuation of the annuity in fact, though one was urged by counsel as the proper method of arriving at the proper result, and secondly, the V.-C. took advantage of a charge of the annuity on a share of the estate to direct it to be paid in full out of that share, until exhausted. Here there has been a valuation, and the only fund out of which the annuity can possibly be paid is that with which the petition seeks to deal.—p. 516.

KEKEWICH, J.—In Maffett, in re, Chitty, J., had to consider how an annuity for which a testator's estate was liable ought to be paid as between the tenant for life and remainderman, and, according to the head-note, he held that the annuity must be capitalised and borne by the tenant for life and remainderman in proportion to the value of their respective interests. Not being able to extract this from the reported judgment, or to understand precisely what was done, I thought it right to send for the order. That order declares that the sum certified to have been paid to the annuitant out of income, and all future payments of such annuity, or the sum necessary to purchase an annuity in lieu of the said annuity, ought to be raised or provided for by a sale or mortgage of a sufficient portion of the testator's estate; and it directs a sale or mortgage of the freehold or leasehold property of the testator for the purpose of raising the costs payable thereout, and also the sum certified to have been paid out of income as above mentioned, and such sum as may be necessary for the purpose of securing the future payments of the annuity. That directly confirms the view I have expressed respecting the rights of the parties, and makes precisely such a declaration, and gives such a direction as that view would justify and suggest. . . . It will, I think, be found that other authorities are in harmony with this,

1, at any rate, any apparent departure from it due to special circumstances. In Yates v. Yates for instance, the practical difficulty was caused by the fact that, until sold, a large part of the real estate on which the annuity was charged produced no income.—p. 447

BUCKLEY, J.—The question I have to decide is whether, under the deed, payment of the rent-charge is to be enforced by a sale of the inheritance. There are cases in which, when rent-charges have been created, although there was no express power of sale, the Court has given its assistance by ordering a sale. The earliest of those cases is Cupit v. Jackson, and the result of the cases is that, subject to the decision of the Court, the owner of a rent-charge is entitled to an order for sale of the inheritance, but that the Court will refuse to make the order in certain cases; for instance, where it is inadvisable to wait for a time.—Graves v. Hicks— or in the case instanced by North, J., in Tucker.
In re, the amount of the arrears being small.
 That shows the sort of discretion which the Court exercises where there is no term. But what is the effect of vesting a term in trustees, as in the present case? In Hall v. Hunt, Wood, V.C., thought that the existence of a term altered the rights of the parties. The V.C. was asked to make an order for sale of the fee simple for pay-
 and a sum of 5,000*l.*, and he made an order for sale based on the rent-charge, and not on the 5,000*l.* . . . Although that was a decision on the construction of a particular will, it . . . shows that the Court ought to consider whether the existence of the term is consistent with the right to have a sale ordered by a Court of equity.—

Jackson* (supra, col. 28), I answer that the decision was not made in the absence of authority, for I proceeded upon the decision of Lord Eldon in Buxton v. Monkhouse.

There Lord Eldon gave the very reason upon which I decided Sollory v. Leaver, that the trustee had power to distress. In Sollory v. Leaver the annuitants had a power of distress, and I thought the case was analogous, the principle being that the Court will not help those who have power to help themselves, and I refused to appoint a receiver—p. 500.

CRANWORTH, L.C. saw no ground for questioning the propriety of the decision in Craig v. Duffus except on one point, as to which he observed.—I confess that in the course of this argument a doubt has occurred to my mind, whether it might not have been successfully contended that what took place at the trial, or before the trial, at the opening of the intended trial, in Craig v. Duffus, might by far implication have been held to amount to a consent by the Court and the parties that the order for the trial by jury should be discharged. And if Lord Campbell be correct, as I have no doubt he is, that the Court, with the consent of the parties, might discharge any prior interlocutor, then it would have laid the matter open, and it would have been a matter investigated by the Court, according to its ordinary course of investigation, not embarrassed by any reference to a jury.

Then there was Breadalbane (Lord) v. McGregor, as to which I own I am puzzled; not that I think it bears upon the present case, but I cannot understand by what authority an appeal was entertained from an interlocutor which directed an issue. It is said that it was not an issue directed by the Lord Ordinary. That is not material; for I observe, in looking at the statute, by the 15th section of the 59 Geo. 3, c. 85, it is enacted "that it shall not be competent by representation, reclaiming petition bill of advocation, appeal to the H. L. or otherwise, to bring under review any interlocutor by the said Divisions, Lords Ordinary, or judge of the Admiralty ordering a trial by jury." It is quite clear that the appeal in that case was an appeal (at least, as I read it) against an interlocutor directing a trial by jury. I cannot, therefore, reconcile that with the statute—pp. 649, 650.

LORD WATSON.—There are several decisions of this House in cases coming from Scotland which appear to me to affirm that the judgment of a Court below, pronounced extra curiam curie, is in the nature of an arbiter's award, and that, as a general rule at least, no appeal from it will lie. An appeal was held, on that ground, to be incompetent in Craig v. Duffus, Dudgeon v. Thomson and Renfrew Magistrates v. Hoby. All of these cases had the following features in common—First, the action had been remitted to the Jury Court by an interlocutor which was not subject to review; secondly, the parties had agreed either before the trial commenced or before the jury were asked to consider their verdict, to withdraw the action from jury trial and to accept the decision of the Court, in one instance upon a proof to be taken by commission, and in the others upon the notes of the presiding judge and the productions before him, and finally, the Court referred to was a division of the Court of Session, so that the appeal was against the first and only decision which had been given upon the evidence. I may add that all of these cases involved questions of law arising upon the facts when they were ascertained. The subsequent decision of the House in Buckett v. Morris does not touch upon the authority of these precedents, although it establishes an exception in cases where the party holding the original judgment has stated no objection to an appeal from it to an intermediate Court.—p. 823.

That is a proposition which I think is too broadly stated. I have no doubt but that the object of that appeal was that the bankrupt might get relief, as it were, in bankruptcy or insolvency, and not on the ground that he was improperly made a party.—p. 608.

PEARSON, J.—I have looked at the authorities on the point, and particularly at what was said by the L.JJ. in Wilson v. Church, where an application was made to stay the distribution of a fund in the hands of trustees, pending an appeal to the H. L. Cotton and Brett, L.JJ. were of opinion that the application ought to be granted, but James, L.J. dissented. As I am not acquainted with all the facts of that case, I do not know exactly what the grounds of his dissent were. But, looking at what was said by Lord Brougham in Walburn v. Ingilby, it appears to be by no means the settled rule of the Court that, without any special ground being shown, a fund which has been ordered to be paid out should be retained in Court simply because there is an appeal from the order. Such a rule would, as Lord Esher pointed out in Ingham v. Baxley (1868) 15 Ves. 180; 9 R. R. 276, "palsy the arm of justice."—p. 20.

[In the result the C. A. (BAGGALLAY, LINDLEY and PHIL, L.JJ.) decided that on security being given by the applicant, the payment out should be stayed till the hearing of the appeal. The applicant, however, declined to give the proposed security, and the application was dismissed.]

LORD SELBORNE.—I think it worth while to add a few words on the subject of the appellants' endeavour to introduce upon this appeal evidence which was neither used in, nor offered to, the Court below. Some cases were referred to, one of which, MacCabe v. Hussey, has no bearing upon the point at all. In that case evidence had been rejected in the Court below, the question of the propriety of the rejection of that evidence was raised by the appeal; and the appellants counsel insisted that the House ought not to look at the rejected evidence to see whether, if it had been admitted, it would have made any difference or not, but that if it held it to have been improperly rejected it should simply send the case back. The House very properly took a different view of the matter; but it is quite obvious that that had no bearing upon the general question. With regard to the general question, Lord Lyndhurst, in Attwood v. Small, following Lord Brougham, put the matter upon so proper a footing that it appears to me worth while to remind your Lordships of what he said:—"With respect to the cases that have been cited, it does not appear to me that they go far to decide the present question." The question there was, whether the answer in the cause, which had not been read or entered as read in the Court below, was to be read in this House. "Noel v. Noel was a mere question of construction of a will—there was no dispute as to the facts,—the will having referred to a settlement, it appeared to the noble lords who decided that case, that it was impossible properly to determine the construction of the will without looking into the settlement. There was no dispute that there was such a settlement, no dispute as to a question of fact, it would have been idle therefore to have sent it back to the Court below to hear further evidence and to receive the settlement; the Court, therefore, called for the settlement." . . . "I think, therefore, the general rule ought to prevail in this case, viz., that as this evidence was not tendered in the Court below, it ought not to be offered before the appellate tribunal." And I must add that in the whole of my experience, which extends over a considerable period of time, such a thing never has happened as that this House has allowed any evidence to be introduced which was not used in the Court below.—p. 170.

WILLES, J.—In Walsh v. Trimmer . . . the Court of Ex. Ch. had reversed the decision of the Court of Q. B., and the H. L. reversed the decision of the Ex. Ch. It is clear that the costs applied for in that case and granted were the costs of the appeal to the Ex. Ch. The H. L. did there what was done in Peck v. North Staffordshire Ry. There is no case in which the H. L. has given costs to the appellant on a constructive reversal by the Court of Ex. Ch. of the Court below. . . . Peck v. North Staffordshire Ry. . . . was a somewhat remarkable decision. The conclusion at which the Court arrived was practically correct; for, no doubt, the Ex. Ch., on affirmation of the decision of the Court below, gives costs to the respondents; and so where there was a constructive affirmation of the Court below by the Ex. Ch., by reason of the H. L. reversing the decision of the Ex. Ch., the H. L. would give the costs of the proceedings in the Ex. Ch. But the correct and regular mode of obtaining those costs would appear to be by application to the H. L. . . . One cannot help thinking that the decision in Peck v. North Staffordshire Ry., though very convenient, seems rather like an assumption by the Court from which the appeal originally came of a jurisdiction given by sect. 41 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, to the Court above. It proceeded on a constructive affirmation by the Ex. Ch. of the Court below.—p. 463.

CAIRNS, L.C.—I am anxious, my lords, to say a word upon the subject of costs, more particularly because I observe that in . . . Anderson v. Morice a question was raised as to costs in the case of an appeal where the numbers for affirming and for reversing the judgment appealed against were equal. I did not myself take part in that decision, but I observe that what was ultimately done was that nothing was said in the order upon the subject of costs. Some observations, however, then fell from some members of your lordships' House, which appear to give countenance to the idea that the reason why nothing is said about costs when there is an equal division of votes is, that it is somewhat contrary to justice or to the practice of the House to give costs where there is any division of opinion. Now, my lords, I apprehend that that is not at all the principle upon which your lordships proceed in a case like the present. There are upon these occasions always two separate motions proposed to the House. The first is the motion that the decree appended against be reversed. That motion may be rejected by a majority, or it may be carried by a majority, or the numbers of contents and non-contents may be equal, and thereupon the decree stands affirmed. But in all these cases, if anything is

I am anxious to guard against the idea going abroad among the public that the reason is the division of opinion, for there might well be a division of opinion amongst your lordships, and yet be an order that the appellant was to pay the costs. The true reason is that, in such a case as I have supposed, a motion ordering the appellant to pay costs could not be carried.—p. 219.

Criminal Cause or Matter

Mellor v. Denham (1880) 49 L. J. M. C. 89, 8 Q. B. D. 467; 42 L. T. 498, 44 J. P.

1 Q. B. 273, 79 L. T. 612, 47 W. R. 177; 63 J. P. 100—C.A.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—No doubt there is a series of decisions since Mellor v. Deukhan, in which it has been decided what are criminal causes or matters in respect of which there is no appeal to this Court from the Q. B. D. The last case reported is one relating to the enforcement of a poor rate—Seaman v. Driley—and it was then held by this Court that the proceedings were “a criminal cause or matter,” and consequently that no appeal would lie. The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, was not brought to our attention in that case, for the very good reason that it had already been decided in Reg. v. Price (1880) 49 L. J. M. C. 49, 5 Q. B. D. 300, 42 J. P. 439, 28 W. R. 616; 44 J. P. 248—COCKBURN, C.J., LUSH and BOWEN, J.J., that in granting a distress warrant for a rate justices act ministerially under sect. 4 of the Act of 1879, and not as a court of summary jurisdiction, because the rate itself is the order, and therefore that the Act of 1879 did not apply. But with regard to a general district rate under the Public Health Act, 1875, . . . the justices in such a case are not acting ministerially, but have to adjudicate upon the matter which is brought before them as a court of summary jurisdiction. . . . A doubt like that in this case is taken out of the category of criminal matters. It is made a civil debt.—p. 209. RIGBY and COLLINS, L.J.s, concurred.

Illingworth v. Bulmer East Highway Board (1884) 53 L. J. M. C. 60, 32 W. R. 150—C.A. BRETTE, M.R.—These cases fall within the principle of the decision in Walsall Overseers v. L. & N. W. Ry. and Reg. v. Savin, and not within the principle of the judgment in Reg. v. Swindon Local Board.—p. 61.

COTTON, L.J.—Reg. v. Swindon Local Board is different from this case. Here the proceedings took place under the provisions of the Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50). Section 105 of that statute gives a right of appeal to quarter sessions, then sect. 107 enacts that no proceedings shall be removed by certiorari into the superior Court, but sect. 108 provides that the court of quarter sessions may state the facts specifically for the determination of the Court of K. B., in which case it shall be lawful to remove the proceedings by certiorari, or otherwise, into the Court of K. B. If, therefore, a special case is stated for the opinion of the Q. B. D., pursuant to the provisions of sect. 108, there is no new jurisdiction given to the Q. B. D.: it then exercises its original jurisdiction, and not any new appellate jurisdiction, such as that which was created by the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 269. That is the distinction between the present case and Reg. v. Swindon Local Board. There was by the circumstances of that case no original jurisdiction existing prior to the statute under which that appeal was brought, and by that statute an appeal was given by way of special case to “a superior Court”—*th. (for self, JAMES and BAGGALLAY, L.J.s.)—There [Sagden v. St. Leonards (Lord)] the facts proved in evidence at the trial in support of the will were not contradicted by evidence, or even disputed, and the appeal, therefore, did not really involve a question of disputed facts, but raised the question somewhat in the same way as if the facts had been stated in the form of a special verdict, whether, upon such facts, the will and codicils which were the subject of dispute ought to have been admitted to probate, and, further, the objection to the appeal, upon which the Court decided, was rather the objection that the appellants should have applied to the judge who tried the action for a rehearing, before appealing, than such an objection as arises in this case.—p. 429.

Burrell* “We, by no means say that, even if the verdict and judgment in another case were to follow one another without any interval of time, that fact would make any difference in the treatment by us of the case, provided only the judge clearly takes upon himself the trial of specific questions of fact, and finds his verdict upon them as a matter separate from the judgment which he gives upon that verdict.]

JAMES, L.J.—The passage you have read from the judgment in Krehl v. Burrell was not meant to apply to a case where the judge merely commenced his judgment by saying that he had to decide a question of fact; it was intended to refer to a case where, in the first instance, at the commencement of the trial, the judge said, "I will try the question of fact first," and definite issues of fact were accordingly settled for trial.—p. 483

It does not signify whether the verdict on the facts is given on a day prior to the judgment on the whole case, or whether both are given at the same time, provided that before the trial begins there is a distinct announcement that the issues of fact are to be tried separately. That is what we meant by the passage which has been read from the judgment in Krehl v. Burrell.—p. 484.

Dollman v. Jones (1879) 12 Ch. D. 553, 27 W. R. 877.

JAMES, L.J.—In Krehl v. Burrell we went as far as we could towards assimilating the practice of the Ch. D. to that of the Common Law Divisions. Where a judge has done what the M.R. did in that case, defined an issue and found a verdict upon it, we follow the rule of the Common Law Divisions, and the objection that such a practice was unknown in the Court of Ch. is got over. In the Court of Ch. there was no such thing as a motion for a new trial. There was an appeal, and on appeal every question came before the C.A. That practice has never been abolished, and where the judge does not do what was done in Krehl v. Burrell, it continues in force.—p. 555

BRETT, L.J.—It was held, in Krehl v. Burrell, that Ord. XXXIX. r. 1 does not generally apply to cases in the Ch. D. The Court in that case was somewhat astute in going as far as it could in assimilating the practice in the different Divisions, but when it was decided that the order does not apply generally in the Ch. D., it seems to follow that the Court cannot go the whole way in such assimilation.—p. 556.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—The reasoning in Krehl v. Burrell may seem to show that the motion for a new trial is right. I cannot, however, agree with the judgment in that case at all events; the decision must be confined to cases where at the trial of the action the facts are found separately, and judgment is reserved, and is pronounced at a subsequent time.—p. 138

JAMES, L.J.—With regard to McAndrew v. Barker, I wish to say that I think it was a little too strong to say that the Court has no discretionary power to enlarge the time for appealing unless there has been conduct on the part of the respondent raising an equity against him. The Court did not intend to lay down a rule in every case. It was not intended, for instance, to apply to the case of inevitable accident.—p. 120

COTTON, L.J.—This, I think, may be laid down, that when the rules and the Act of Parliament say "that an appeal is to be within a certain time, unless special leave shall be given by the C.A. to bring the appeal after that time," the Court does not grant leave unless there is something which, in the opinion of the Court, entitles the person who applies for extension of time to be relieved against the bar established by the orders and the Act of Parliament. It has been called an equity, but that is not a proper term—it is something which entitles him to ask for the indulgence of the Court, to ask to be relieved from the legal bar that there is in the orders and the Act of Parliament. But it is contended by the respondents (though I think that was not persisted in) that it must be an equity arising from the conduct of the respondent who is opposing the application. That, in my opinion, is erroneous. There were certain observations, undoubtedly, of the late M.R. to support that view, that the person who insisted upon the time is entitled to say, "I have done nothing which raises an equity against me, and therefore you are not to be relieved." That, I think, was almost abandoned in argument, and I should not have referred to it except that it is unfortunate that misapprehensions should exist as to that point, for in New Callao Co. In re, the M.R. concurred in the expression of opinion which I then stated, and which James, L.J. had already stated in another case, that in order that the appellant might be relieved from lapse of time it was not necessary to show that there was something in the conduct of the respondent which entitled the appellant to be relieved, it was sufficient if he satisfied the Court that there was something either in the acts of the respondent or from other circumstances which entitled him to be relieved, and to be allowed to appeal, notwithstanding the time had lapsed—p. 121.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—The counsel for the plaintiff has relied upon Little's Case as one in which the U. A. held that a notice of an intention to appeal should be treated as a notice of appeal, but in that case application was made to the registrar in due time to set down the appeal, and it was in consequence of his declining to do so, on the ground that the notice was not a notice of appeal, but only of an intention to appeal, that the matter was brought before the U. A., and the order then made was an order, not to extend the time for appealing, but to set down the appeal upon the footing that a sufficient notice had been given—p. 61.

Collins v. Paddington Vestry, distinguished. Shubbrook v. Tufnell (1882) 9 Q. B. D. 621, 46 L. T. 719, 30 W. R. 740.—C.A.

JESSEL, M.R.—That case is distinguishable from the present, for there the arbitrator only submitted one point to the Court, there being other matters in the action, so that in whatever way the Court decided that point the case went back to the arbitrator. The first clause of the head-note is too wide; the Court did not decide the general proposition there laid down, but only held that where the decision of the Court on the point submitted to it could not in any event necessitate the entering of final judgment for either party, the decision was interlocutory. Here, if we differ from the Court below, final judgment has to be entered for the defendant, and there is an end of the action.—p. 622 LINDLEY, L.J., concurred.

ESMER, M.R.—I do not agree that it was decided in Reg. v. Kettle that the Court has no discretion to grant an extension of time for appealing under Ord. LIX r. 16. There is no doubt that that was the tendency of Collins v. Paddington Vestry, and that it looks as if at the time when that case was decided a much stricter view of the rules was taken by the Court, and some of the judges of the U. A. considered either that there was no discretion in such a case, or that, if there was a discretion, it ought never to be exercised; but that strict view has since been withdrawn from by nearly every judge of the U. A. I think we ought to say that the Court has a discretion, which must not be exercised loosely, but according to the circumstances of each particular case and that under the circumstances of the present case the application for an extension of time should be granted.—p. 208.

Curtis v. Sheffield (1882) 21 Ch. D. 1; 51 L. J. Ch. 535, 46 L. T. 177, 30 W. R. 561.—C.A.

JESSEL, M.R.—The case of Brandon v. Brandon was a very singular one. The case was heard in 1825, and anybody looking at the Master's report and knowing our law could have seen that there was a blunder in it. The report stated that there was a widow and found who were the next of kin, and through some slip in drafting it omitted the widow from the persons entitled to the personality. The decree followed this error and declared that the personal estate belonged to the next of kin as found by the Master, leaving out the widow. This manifest blunder escaped notice until 1846. Some steps were taken in that year, when the Master made a report finding that the testator's widow was entitled to a share, it having apparently escaped notice that the decree in 1825 had confirmed the Master's previous report which excluded the widow. An exception was taken to the report of 1816 but nothing was done, and the matter slept till 1856, when the widow's representatives applied for leave to appeal from the decree of 1825. The real question had been raised in 1846, just after the expiration of the twenty years, and the case was beyond argument, being that of a manifest and obvious blunder.

Walmley v. Forhall was under the five years' rule and the application was made within nine years from the date of the decree. It is material to observe that the time for appealing was then five years and the appellant was three-and-a-half years over the time. The time for appealing now is one year, and the present appellant is forty-five years after the time. I think that as a distinction between the two cases. Again, all that can be taken to have been decided in that case was that the irregularity in the decree was a sufficient special circumstance when it was called to the attention of the Court before anything else had happened. As I understand it in that case no change had taken place since the making of the decree in 1854 until December, 1862, when a child died. The plaintiffs in 1863 applied for leave to appeal, and urged that there ought to have been no declaration as to cross-remainders, and that the decree was irregular in deciding a future right. And then it was said, and said truly enough, that in 1854 the Court had not before it the proper parties to argue the question, for that parties affected by it might afterwards come into existence. Whereas here, as I said before, every person who could by any possibility be interested was of age and was present at the argument. So that we have in Walmley v. Forhall two circumstances which do not occur here, first of all a short lapse of time, and secondly the fact of a change in the parties—p 6 COTTON and LINDLEY, L.JJ concurred.

But no particulars are stated from which we may tell why the order to dismiss was made so early. BAGGALLAY, L.J.—The action in Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. was of a very special nature. The plaintiff was a workman employed by a contractor who was executing a work for the company, but acting under the orders of the contractor. The action was against the company, on the ground that it was answerable for the negligence of the engineer who was its servant, the decision was adverse to the plaintiff, on the ground that the plaintiff and the engineer were engaged in a common employment under the orders and control of the contractor. It was pressed on the C. A., of which I was at the time a member, and I well remember the case, that it would be a denial of justice to the plaintiff, who had been reduced to poverty by the accident, if he could not appeal without giving security for costs. It was also urged in his favour that the point had never been before a Court of error; but the decision went, not on that, but on the ground that, having regard to the whole circumstances of the case, it would have been a denial of justice to allow the plaintiff to appeal without giving security: it was not intended to lay down any such general rule as is now contended for.—p. 484. BOWEN and FRY, L.J.J. concurred.

Cropper v. Smith (1883) 24 Ch. D. 305; 49 L. T. 518, 32 W. R. 212.—C.A.

BRETT, M.R.—Then, in order that the C. A. and the Court below may not incur the risk of deciding in different ways as to staying proceedings without either of them knowing of the application to the other, the rule imposes this limitation, that although the jurisdiction is co-ordinate, and although it is alternative, yet the C. A. will not exercise its jurisdiction until it knows whether the co-ordinate jurisdiction of the Divisional Court has been exercised, and how. That seems to me to be the true reaching of the 17th rule. But then it is said that the rule has been construed differently in Att.-Gen. v. Swansea, &c. Tramways Co. In that case an appeal had been brought by the defendants from a judgment of Hall, V.-C., and an application was made to him to stay the proceedings under that judgment pending the appeal. Therefore there was an application to the Court below, but the V.-C. did not decide it either one way or the other, but ordered the motion to stand over for a week to await the result of an application to the C. A. to advance the hearing of the appeal. The defendants made that application to the C. A., but they also joined with it an application to the C. A. to stay proceedings pending the appeal. Now inasmuch as the V.-C. had not entertained the application before him so as to decide it either one way or the other, and the applications before both Courts were pending at the same time, it seems to me that the 17th rule was plainly broken, and thereupon the decision of the C. A. was, "We cannot entertain this application until there has been a decision in the Court below." The V.-C. then heard the application, and granted a stay of the proceedings. Then it was thought right for the defendants to go to the C. A. and say, "We have dropped our application to the C. A. to stay proceedings." This shows that they were under the impression that they might have come to the C. A., not making a new application by way of appeal, but going on with the old application, otherwise they could not say they had dropped it. It is obvious then that the counsel engaged in the case did not understand the decision of the Court to be that the motion by the C. A. must be an appeal strictly so called. It is true that the M.R. (Jessel) used phraseology which might be read as showing that he thought it must be an appeal. He says, "The rest of the motion must stand over to await the result of the application to the V.C. to stay the proceedings. Probably what Mellish, L.J. meant" (in Cropper v. Smith, vol. 11) "was that the motion might be heard without being formally set down as an appeal." What does that mean? It surely did not mean that the only thing that Mellish, L.J. meant was that the motion need not be put in a list, because putting it in a list has nothing to do with the law or with the rule. I think he meant that the motion was not strictly an appeal. But the M.R. goes on to say, "It must necessarily be a motion by way of appeal, for this Court and the Court below cannot have co-ordinate jurisdiction." The last part of this sentence is, I think, incorrect. It is quite true that under the 17th rule the motion in the C.A. must be by way of appeal, because there cannot be an application to the C.A. to stay the proceedings, unless the Court below has refused to stay them, and then, although the motion in the C.A. is under its original jurisdiction, yet it is correct to say that it is by way of appeal, because it is made for the purpose of getting a different decision from that which has been come to by the Court below. Therefore all the expressions of Sir G. Jessel, except this last one, that the Court below and this Court cannot have co-ordinate jurisdiction, seem to me to be strictly correct. The M.R. having dropped that expression, it is not to be assumed that my brother Cotton and I, because we concurred in the decision (probably without saying anything), are to be taken to have agreed to every word which fell from the M.R., it being our business only to see before we concurred in a decision that it is in our opinion right and substantially put upon right grounds, and not to correct any error in grammar, any supposed inaccuracy of expression. . . . The plaintiff there (Otto v. Ludford) appealed from an order directing him to pay costs. . . . The plaintiff asked for leave to give short notice of motion to restrain the defendant from enforcing the certificate for costs, pending the appeal, and the M.R. says, "Have you applied to the Court below?" The plaintiff's counsel thereupon cited Wilson v. Church, and the M.R. says, "That was a case of an entirely different description. The plaintiffs there were seeking for an injunction to restrain the trustees from parting with the trust funds pending the appeal. That was not an application to stay proceedings under the order appealed from, for that order did not give any directions for dealing with the funds, and the Court below having dismissed the action, had no jurisdiction to grant such an injunction. In the present case, the plaintiff is seeking a stay of proceedings under the order appealed from, which application the V.C. has jurisdiction to entertain, and it ought to be made to him in the first instance." That is nothing more than rule 17—p. 809.

It has been generally conceived that the effect of the judgment was that in all cases of appeal from the judge in Chambers to the judge in Court the twenty-one days should be calculated from the day when the order was made and not from the time when the order was perfected, and I was myself under that impression until my attention was more particularly drawn to it. That case, it will be noticed, was a case of a refusal to make an order, and therefore, if the analogy of Ord LVIII. r. 15, was adopted, the time would run from the making of the order; and when you turn to the judgments of the learned judges in that case it will be seen that they did not intend to lay down that in all cases the twenty-one days were to be computed from the day when an order was made, but that, there being no distinct provision as to this matter in the rules of the Court, the judges in the Ch. D. would adopt by analogy the course pointed out by Ord LVIII. r. 15.—p. 334.

 STUART, V.-C.—I cannot say that I quite follow the reasoning of the decision in *Plumbe v.  MALINS, V.-C.—That case Jones v. Ogle turned upon the particular words of the will, which were, "As to the share and interest which I have in the Lilleshall Iron Company, I bequeath the dividends and income thereof to my uncle J. T. Ogle for his life, and after his death the same share and interest shall belong to his two daughters in equal shares", and the decision of the Court of Appeal, affirming the view of the Master of the Rolls, turned on the effect of those words. Now, if a man says, "I give all the dividends I am able to give," does not that include the whole of the dividends, irrespective of any apportionment? So, in this case, the testator could do what he pleased with his property, and if he had used the words, "I give my lands, and all the rents accruing for or in respect thereof," that would have been, like Jones v. Ogle, an express gift of accruing rents, and I should have held it so, the cardinal point in construing wills being to ascertain the testator's intention. But I am bound to say there are some observations of the Lord Chancellor which seem rather to imply a doubt whether the Act of 1870 is to apply to wills already made, or made before the passing of the Act. There is, however, no decision on the subject, and therefore I cannot regard it as fettering my opinion in this case, and I think the true answer is this—that if the legislature had intended the Act not to apply to instruments already executed, they would probably have said so—p. 630

KINDERSLEY, V.-C.—In Fletcher v. Moore I assumed, too hastily, perhaps, that the decision in Lock v. De Burgh assumed that both branches of that clause went on the same footing, and I considered that that case threw a doubt upon what appeared to me to be the true construction of the statute. I have now, however, the advantage of Wood, V.-C.'s decision, and taking that to be right, there is no doubt that the decision in Lock v. De Burgh is right also, and I am bound to assume that Knight Bruce, L.J., had in his mind the idea of the distinction between the two branches of this clause, though he did not express it. I am glad of this opportunity of saying that some of the reasoning in Fletcher v. Moore cannot be supported consistently with the view I now take of the statute. The question, however, in Fletcher v. Moore was between a tenant for life and trustees for accumulation, and as to the rents of the half-year accruing at the time when the former attained twenty-one, and not between a tenant for life's representatives and remaindermen. So that in that case the Act had no application. I feel that I rightly decided the case on the merits of it, but not rightly as to the effects of the Act. Lord Cottonham's decision in Merkey, In re, is thought by Wood, V.-C. to have been consistent with his view in Hummer v. Whiteley, but in reaching the judgment of Lord Cottonham it is difficult to say whether he took the same view or not—p. 608.

MALINS, V.-C.—If there had been no authority on this question, my conclusion would have been in favour of the petitioner, because, looking at the will itself, there can be no question of the testator's intention. His object was merely to provide for the ordinary accumulation until his nephew came of age, and that then he should be let into possession, and, of course, have the whole rents and dividends. But the question is not untouched by authority, for the point has been decided in three different cases, and though Shipperdon v. Tower is contradicted by Campbell v. Campbell, yet there is a second decision in favour of an apportionment, viz. St. Aubyn v. St. Aubyn. . . and I cannot distinguish that case from the present.—p. 222.

Clive v. Clive (1872) L. R. 7 Ch. 433; 41 L. J. Ch. 986; 26 L. T. 409, 20 W. R. 477.

JAMES, L.J.—Shipperdon v. Tower was decided as long ago as 1844, and no attempt has been made to shake or question it. We must, therefore, take it to be the curæ curiæ, and also the settled understanding of conveyancers, that the Apportionment Act did apply to cases of this kind. The new Act of the 38 & 34 Vict. c. 85, extended the principle of the Act of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 22, in the same direction, so as to make it applicable to every form of reservation of income, which was in all cases to be treated as if it were interest accruing de die in diem, so that there might be no more questions on this subject—p. 437. MELLISH, L.J. concurred.

Lawrence v. Lawrence (1884) 26 Ch. D. 795; 53 L. J. Ch. 982, 50 L. T. 715, 32 W. R. 791.

PEARSON, J.—All the cases, I think, in the books touching the Apportionment Act were cited to me by counsel in the argument, and I am bound to say, having since looked at them, that there is no one of them that really decides this case. The only one which seems to decide it is the case before the late Malins, V.-C. (In re Cline's Estate), in which he expressed his opinion, but without argument. The case was not opposed at all, and I think, therefore, Mr. Hardy was perfectly justified in saying that this case ought to be considered without reference to that decision. In so doing, I feel certain I am doing what my learned predecessor would have done if he were here, because I am sure he would say that having given his opinion upon the former case without hearing argument against that opinion he was quite prepared to consider this case as if it were entirely new and to alter his opinion if argument induced him to do so.—p. 798.

[In Whitehead v. Whitehead Malins, V.-C., said, "I think that a specific legacy is not within the Apportionment Act, 1870."]

MALINS, V.-C. said that with regard to the report of Whitehead v. Whitehead he certainly did not intend to lay down the rule so broadly as there stated. On the contrary, he did not think that, as a general rule, a specific bequest was not apportionable—p. 168.

JESSEL, M.R.—The judges felt themselves bound by the decision in that case, and therefore gave leave for this appeal, in order that the decision in Royce v. Charlton might be reviewed. I must say I think that case was not rightly decided, and we decide the present case on the first point with the understanding that it in effect overrules Royce v. Charlton.—p. 640

COLLIERIDGE, C.J.—But if in a contract with an infant you put anything in which cannot possibly be for his benefit, the whole contract is invalidated. . . . The master has stipulated to find him reasonable work during the whole time of the apprenticeship; that is an absolute stipulation for work being found and wages paid, whether there is a turnout or not. Having made this, the master then, for his own protection, inserts a contractual stipulation that he need not find him work nor pay him wages if there is a turnout. I think that this is fatal to the deed, and that the case was rightly decided on principle. I think that it was also rightly decided on authority, and that the older cases remain of force covering the matter, and that the qualified decision in Leslie v. Fitzpatrick does not bind us to decide contrary to them.—p. 73 WILLIAMS, J. agreed.

CHITTY, J.—That case [Gylbert v. Fletcher] has never been questioned from that time to this, and it is cited in the various text-books as an authority.—p. 163.

I ought to say one word about Fellows v. Wood, which was cited as an authority for granting an injunction against an infant, where the infant had entered into a contract. On carefully reading the report I am persuaded that the defendant in that case was not an infant at the time when the injunction was granted, and it was not a contract of apprenticeship, it was a mere contract of service. There is ground also for thinking that, after the infancy had terminated, the defendant did continue to serve, and then, although he might have vacated the employment at a fortnight's notice, what he did was to go away, and then, in breach of an article to be found in the contract of employment, he served the plaintiff's customers for his own benefit. That is what he was doing, and that is what he was restrained from doing. . . . In Fellows v. Wood there could have been no ground for avoiding the contract not to serve the plaintiff's customers as being an unlawful restraint of trade.—pp. 154, 155.

ELLENBOROUGH, C.J.—When this case was before me at nisi prius, the plaintiff's right to recover was rested upon Eades v. Vandepuit, and it occurred to me at that time, and afterwards still more strongly upon looking into that case, that it is but a very loose note; for as to the defendant Vandepuit, who was in the King's service, suppressing an action for work and labour could have been maintained, yet it was work and labour for the King and not for Vandepuit; and therefore in his character of captain of a ship-of-war he could not have been the object of such an action. It does not, however, appear by the note of that case what the form of the action was, if the captain had enticed away the apprentice, perhaps he might have been liable to tort. But under the uncertainty both of fact and form which attends that case, I think no very material argument is to be derived from it.—p. 197.

 WOOD V.-C.—In Dimsdale v. Robertson Lord
 St. Leonards felt considerable difficulty in contending with a stream of authority of great force, in which several learned judges, including Lord
 Eldon, without actually overruling Halfhide v.
Fenning, expressed strong doubts as to the soundness of the principle involved. He preferred, however, following Lord Kenyon's decision. It is true that the particular covenant not to sue, as a process to take any remedy other than that specifically pointed out by the agreement, which occurred in both these cases, does not exist in the case before me; but Lord St. Leonards relied upon other points which do not exist in the present case. These observations of Lord St. Leonards have been commented on by the present L.C. in Scott v. Liverpool Corporation, which fell within the principle of Scott v.
Avery. It is impossible to pass over the decision in Dimsdale v. Robertson, both on account of the high authority of the judge by whom it was decided, and because it seems to have been entirely overlooked in the discussion of several similar cases. In that instance Lord St. Leonards, after reviewing the authorities on the subject, arrived at a conclusion apparently at variance with them. In the view which I have taken of this case it is unnecessary for me to consider the propriety of the decision in Dimsdale v. Robertson, but I cannot forbear remarking that the circumstances upon which Lord St. Leonards relied, as giving greater effect to the agreement to refer in that case, namely, the power to make the submission a rule of Court, and the legislative authority given to arbitrators of examining witnesses on oath, hardly appear sufficient to distinguish the case from others in which these conditions are not found, because these provisions are mere directions as to the mode in which the reference is to be conducted, or means for enabling the parties to give greater efficacy to it, by suing out attachment for disobedience, and do not operate until the case has been withdrawn from the action of the regular tribunals—a withdrawal which, according to the earlier decisions, the parties have no power to effect—p. 86.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—It is contended that the policy must be signed by both parties in order to bring it within the Arbitration Act, 1889. But that Act nowhere says that both parties must sign. Carlson Tinplate Co. v. Hughes has been cited to us as an authority for this contention; but I do not agree that it is. In that case, no doubt, it was necessary that both parties should sign. The parties there had never been ad idem, and there was no complete contract. The two notes that constituted the contract in that case differed in material particulars, and therefore one of the parties, who was unwilling, could not be compelled to submit to arbitration. But that does not apply to this case at all. Here there is a perfectly good contract, one of the conditions of which is that all disputes arising under it shall be referred to arbitration.—p. 830.

A. L. SMITH, J.—As regards Carlson Tinplate Co. v. Hughes, I think that the decision arrived at in that case depended entirely on the facts peculiar to that case.—p. 840.

North London Ry. v. G. N. Ry. (1883) 52 L. J. Q. B. 380, 11 Q. B. D. 30, 48 L. T. 685; 31 W. R. 440—C.A. BURNETT and COTTON, L.JJ.; reversing 47 L. T. 383.—FIELD and STEPHEN, JJ., discussed and distinguished.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Now, notwithstanding the argument that if the claimant is wrong he cannot recover on the award, and therefore the company need not attend before the arbitrator, it is quite obvious that all prudent men (and railway companies must act as prudent people) would watch the proceedings before the arbitrator, and must therefore incur costs. Notwithstanding that, and notwithstanding the apparent enlargement by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, of the power of the Court to grant an injunction, the C.A. has decided, in North London Ry. v. G. N. Ry., that the practice settled by Lord Tenterden in East and West India Dock, &c. Co. v. Gatliffe [20 L. J. Ch. 217, 3 Mac & G. 155. See "LANDS CLAUSES ACT"] as long ago as 1851, has not been altered by the Judicature Acts, and that there is still no right or jurisdiction in the Ch. D. of the High Court to restrain a person from proceeding for compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, on the ground that he is not entitled to compensation. The decision in that case must not be understood as going further than that. The grounds upon which it proceeds are perfectly explained by the M.R. and by Cotton, L.J. The case does not decide that in no case is it right to restrain persons from proceeding to arbitration. There are cases in which it is quite right to do so. . . Having arrived at the real grounds of the decision in North London Ry. v. G. N. Ry. we have to consider whether there is any substantial difference between that case and this. That there is a difference has been pointed out by Mr. Romer, viz., that Mr. Cross here is assuming to take proceedings in the name of the ferry company, and, it is alleged, without authority. . . It is right I should make a few observations upon the reasons given by Chitty, J. [in the Court below], for distinguishing this case from that of North London Ry. v. G. N. Ry. He put it on this ground, that Mr. Cross was proceeding without authority, and that therefore there was jurisdiction to restrain him from using the names of his alleged principals, and he referred to the doctrine that if an action is brought by a person without authority it can be stopped. That is, no doubt, quite true but upon what principle is that done? It is upon the principle that the Court can control the proceedings before itself, and if a person without authority is bringing an action in the name of another it is an abuse of the process of the Court, and the Court can stop it. That seems to me not to apply to a case of this kind, and I think that this is not the right way of raising the question whether Mr. Cross has authority to go on. He must go on at his peril—pp 368—370. FRY and LOPIN, L.J. to the same effect

LINDLEY, L.J.—In North London Ry. v. G. N. Ry. there was an agreement to refer; one party wanted to refer, and the other did not, and the other brought an action to stop the reference. There was no impeaching the agreement or anything of the kind. . . . and when you look at the judgments of Brett and Cotton, L.J., you find they said that the Courts of equity never did such a thing; they said—and there was the important part of the decision—that sect. 25 of the Judicature Act had not extended the jurisdiction of the Court to do it. That was the decision, they never meant to say that in cases where the Court of equity used to interfere the power was gone. Whether the Appeal Court has taken too narrow a view of, or placed too narrow a construction upon, sect. 25 is another matter altogether. I do not consider I am at liberty to discuss the question. . . . That case does not touch the principle, and I protest altogether against being thought to flatter away a case which I am bound to follow. . . . London and Blackwall Ry. v. Cross was really a case under the Lands Clauses Act, and amounts to this, that, notwithstanding sect. 25 of the Judicature Act, the Court will not alter the practice which has prevailed under the Lands Clauses Act since it was settled by Lord Truro some fifty years ago. When Lord Truro decided East and West India Docks, &c. Co. v. Guttle there was a considerable difference of opinion. The inconveniences were pointed out by him, and also by Lord Cottenham, who thought the best way was to allow a person to bring an action or file a bill, and have his rights determined before the arbitration. Lord Truro thought that that was inconvenient, and that the best way under the Lands Clauses Act was to let the parties have an arbitration and get their rights determined. . . . What we said in London and Blackwall Ry. v. Cross was that, notwithstanding sect. 25 of the Judicature Act, we should not alter, but would stand by, the practice as it had been settled in East and West India Docks, &c. Co. v. Guttle (see col. 54)—p. 47.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., who also discussed North London Ry. v. G. N. Ry., said—I do not think anyone would stand up and argue that sect. 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873, was intended to curtail the jurisdiction of the Court, which seems to have been the point that was specially argued in Mann v. Tinsdale (1894) 63 L. J. Q. B. 454. [1894] 1 Q. B. 671.—C.A. See "INJUNCTIONS," in which case Lord Halsbury held that it was intended to enlarge it; but he stands by himself at the present—p. 50.

JESSEL, M.R. — The great object of these clauses is to prevent the delay and expense of litigation but we must not forget in deciding upon them that they do deprive one of the parties, that is the one who objects to the arbitration, of the right to resort to the ordinary tribunals of the country, and he is entitled to say, "show me that I have agreed to refer this matter to an arbitrator." I say so because it was attempted to be argued before us, and Willesford v. Watson was cited to show, that the Court would not decide that point. I must say that when Lord Selborne's decision comes to be examined it appears to me to show by inference the contrary, for in referring the construction of the articles, and the question as to certain acts which were alleged to be outside the agreement, to the decision of the arbitrator, he went very carefully through the case and very carefully through the provisions as to the reference to arbitration, and showed that they were so wide that they not only included the construction of the document itself, but also the question as to whether the acts complained of were or were not within the terms of the matters referred to arbitration. Of course persons can agree to refer to arbitration not merely disputes between them, but even the question whether the disputes between them are within the arbitration clause.—p. 208.

JESSEL, M.R.—The only case which has been cited directly bearing upon the point is a case before Wickens, V.-C. of Willesford v. Watson, in which, although the point was not decided by him because he thought it was a proper case in which to make the order to refer to arbitration, yet he says this: "Such orders have been frequently made by Courts of law. The construction which these Courts have put on the clause seems to have been that, whenever the agreement to refer covers the question which the action raises, the matter should be referred, even although it is properly one of law, and even though the defendant's case may be properly raiseable in a cross action; in fact, in all cases except where there is a question of actual fraud. In cases of actual fraud the Court refuses to interfere on two grounds: first, because when personal fraud is in issue the case is properly one of publicity, and for a jury; and secondly, because the parties to a contract can hardly be supposed to have endeavoured to refer to a conventional tribunal any attempt by one of them to cheat the other. But in all other cases the Courts of law seem to consider that the defendant is entitled to the reference when he once has shown that the point is one which the plaintiff agreed to refer." That is not a statement of the V.-C.'s own judgment, but of what he understood to be the practice in the Courts of law, and it is very singular that the industry of counsel has not furnished me with a decision at law laying down anything of the kind, and I am not at present aware from what source the V.-C. derived his conclusions. Different minds are differently affected by a consideration of the same circumstances, but, speaking for myself, I am by no means persuaded that these reasons are sufficient, or that the Courts of common law have ever laid down that they are.—p. 476.

The first was that he had obtained a series of consents from the defendant for the extension of the time for the delivery of reply. No doubt if the consent had been refused the plaintiff would have had to take out a summons, and that summons would have been a step." That observation of the learned judge appears to have been cited by North, J. with approval in Brighton Marine Palace and Pier Co. v. Woodhouse. Then there is Ives and Barker v. Willans. BRETT, M.R.—In this case the Master was not satisfied that the proceedings ought to be stayed, nor was the judge, but the Div. Court differed from the judge and stayed the proceedings in the action; but the Div. Court did not differ on the point of discretion, for the Div. Court thought the Court was bound by a decision of the C. A. in Hodgson v. Railway Passengers' Assurance Co. I am, however, of opinion that that case laid down no general rule of law, and I think the Div. Court were misled by the impression that that case was decided on some general rule of law, and not, as it seems to me, on the facts of that case, which satisfied the judge and the Court that that action ought to be stayed.—p. 307.

But, upon considering that case, in which the objection appears to have been given way to without any argument on the part of the counsel who had obtained the rule for an attachment, and on which account the matter was probably not brought under the immediate view and attention of the Court; and upon conferring, with a view to an uniformity of practice on this subject, with most of the judges of the other Courts of Westminster Hall, we are of opinion that the case referred to cannot be supported.—p. 193.

v. WILLIAMS, L.J.—If the judgments of the M.R. (Lord Esher) and Lindley, L.J., in Smith and Nelson, In re, be read by the light of the argument for the appellants, it is quite clear that they did not intend to say that sect. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, did not apply to the case because the reference was to three arbitrators. The argument for the appellants was that sect. 4 did not apply to the case because no legal proceedings had been commenced, and it was for that reason that the Court said that sect. 4 did not apply. No application could be made to stay the proceedings until the action had been commenced. But in the circumstances of the present case it is quite plain that sect. 4 applies, and the applicants for a stay, having given their undertaking to name an arbitrator, are entitled to have the stay for which they ask.—p. 874.

STIRLING, J.—The meaning of "entering on the reference" was considered in Baker v. Stephens, where it was held that it meant not merely the making an appointment to hear the parties, but actually beginning to hear them, and that an award was made in time if within the limit reckoned, not from when the arbitrator accepted the office, or took upon himself the functions of arbitrator by giving notice of his intention to proceed, but from when he entered into the matter of the reference, either with both parties before him, or under a peremptory appointment enabling him to proceed ex parte.—p. 624.

CHITTY, L.J.—Our decision is quite consistent in principle with that of Lord Escher and the other members of the Court in Keighley, Marsden & Co. and Durrant & Co., In re (post, col. 72). There, in dealing with sect. 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, the Court referred to the corresponding sect. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and the previous decisions on that section. But they had not to take into their consideration the new enactment of sect. 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and the general effect of that enactment on arbitrations, and on the application of sect. 10 to circumstances such as those before us. . . . In East and West India Dock Co. v. Kirk, decided before the Arbitration Act, 1889, was passed, it was held by the House of Lords that the Court had jurisdiction to give leave to revoke the submission if there was reasonable ground for supposing that the arbitrator was going wrong in point of law, even in a matter within his jurisdiction. The leave would have been given in the circumstances of that case if the parties had not come to terms that the arbitrator should state a special case for the decision of the Court. This jurisdiction, as was held in James v. James (supra), is discretionary, and to be exercised according to the circumstances of the case. In East and West India Dock Co. v. Kirk the discretion was exercised while the arbitration was still pending, and consequently the decision does not directly bear on the present case.—p. 4.

The Court (LINDLEY, BOWEN and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ.) held that as the arbitrator had stated his award in the form of a special case, an appeal lay to the C. A. from the judgment of the Div. Court (Pollock, B. and Williams, J.). Knight and Tabernacle Permanent Building Society, In re, was not in point, because there the special case was not a statement of the arbitrator's award, but merely the submission for the opinion of the Court of a question of law arising in the course of the reference, and consequently the opinion of the Court upon it was merely consultative, and not a judicial decision, and therefore not appealable.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Then comes the question as to whether there has been such an appointment as to give jurisdiction to the umpire; and what appears to be the case is, that the two arbitrators, not being able to agree in the appointment of an umpire, did cast lots as to which of two persons should be appointed, but then, before they did that, they each agreed that the man proposed by the other was a fit and proper person to be umpire, and to discharge the duties which would be thrown upon him. We have it, therefore, that there was undoubtedly a concurrent judgment as to the fitness of the person who was finally appointed; and when the arbitrators have come to such a concurrence as to the fitness of either of two persons for the office of umpire, and the only difference between them is as to which of the two they shall appoint, and the appointment is settled by lot, such a case falls directly within the decision of Neale v. Ledger, a case upheld by the Court of C. P. in European and American Steam Shipping Co. v. Croakey, where Erie, C.J., in pronouncing the judgment of the Court, distinguishes it from Cassell, Ex parte, and says that Neale v. Ledger ought to be upheld in any case in which the facts are the same. A similar point came before the Court in Morgan v. Boulth, where all the cases now cited were mentioned, and this Court, acting on Neale v. Ledger and European and American Steam Shipping Co. v. Croakey, came to the same conclusion.—p. 375.

[At a sale by auction one of the conditions was that, if any mistake was made in the description of any of the properties offered for sale, or if any error whatever appeared in the particulars of sale, such mistake or error should not annul the sale, but a compensation in such case should be given, to be settled by two referees, one to be appointed by either party to the sale, or an umpire. It was held, following Collins v. Collins, that, the reference indicated in the condition being one of the quantum of compensation only, was not a reference to arbitration of an existing or future difference within the meaning of the C. L. P. Act, 1854, s. 11; and that the plaintiffs had, therefore, no power under sect. 13 of that Act to appoint their referee as sole arbitrator.]

LUSH, J.—There are various sections in the Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, referring to arbitration. There are sections which also contemplate the appointment of an umpire in the event of the arbitrators disagreeing, but there is no section which gives power to any person to appoint an umpire for the settling of a dispute in cases where the arbitrators differ or neglect to appoint an umpire. The only clause providing the means of appointing an umpire where the arbitrators disagree, is confined to disputes between claimants and railway companies, and then the umpire is to be appointed by the Board of Trade. But nothing in those sections warrants the appointment of an umpire by a judge. However, Lord, In re, before the present V.-C., then Wood, V.-C., sanctioned as it is by the decision of this Court in Anglo-Italian Bank and De Rosaz, In re, is an authority that the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 12, would enable a judge to make that appointment.—p. 471. ESHER, M.R.—The case comes within the authority of Collins v. Collins and Bos v. Helsham, which decide that persons so appointed are valuers, not arbitrators. Hopper, In re, is not inconsistent; there the judges of the Court of Q. B. only said that if those cases bore the construction which counsel had attempted to put upon them, they could not agree with them; they did not say that they thought the cases had been wrongly decided. Blackburn, J. said: "Collins v. Collins and Bos v. Helsham go to this extent, that, where compensation is to be settled by a particular person, that is not necessarily an award. In that I quite agree. An appraisement is not necessarily an award. If those cases are to be supposed to go as far as to decide that an agreement to assess compensation and ascertain value could not be a matter of arbitration, and there is to be no award, I should certainly pause before I concurred in them." Hooper, In re, therefore, in no way takes away from the authority of Collins v. Collins and Bos v. Hesham.—p. 430. BAGGALLAY, L.J. concurred.

MAULE, J.—I think that the words "of and concerning the said several premises so referred as aforesaid," make the award sufficient without a special finding on each particular point, and that the award is conclusive. This opinion... is in accordance with the decided cases. In Dunn v. Warlters Lord Abinger does not say that he would have decided otherwise, but he merely says he would have required time to consider the subject, and if he had done so I am inclined to think he would have come to the same conclusion. Gyde v. Boucher is opposed to the other cases; but when the alternative is, either to overrule the decision of one judge, or to overrule a long current of authorities, I do not think that the Court can entertain much doubt.—p. 58.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—Notwithstanding my very great respect for the judges who expressed the opinion they did in Gumm v. Fowler, I have much misgiving with respect to it.—p. 329.

BRETT, L.J.—But I think that the words of this reference do, according to the decision in Gumm v. Fowler, amount to an agreement that there shall be no appeal against the opinion of the Court or the decision of the arbitrator. Whether I should have thought so or not at the time when that case was decided, I do not know. But that case was decided in 1860, and the interpretation then given to those words has been adopted in the recognised books of the profession ever since.—p. 330.

Donlan v. Brett (1834) 2 A. & E. 344; 4 N. & M. 854; 4 L. J. K. B. 55.

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—In this case it was contended, in support of the rule, that an award, that a verdict for a sum named should be entered for the plaintiff, is tantamount to an order that the defendant shall pay so much to the plaintiff. My brother Littledale's decision in Cartwright v. Blackworth is in favour of this view: on the other side a case in the Ex. (Jackson v. Clark (1825) M. & W. 299; 13 Price 208) was cited as being opposed to it. We have conferred with my brother Littledale, and he agrees with us that the rule cannot be made absolute; and he informs us that he should not have decided as he did in Cartwright v. Blackworth, if he had been aware of the case in the Ex.—p. 347.

GROVE, J.—There seems to me to be no distinction between Cartwright v. Blackworth and this case. There there was an enlargement of the rule: here there was a postponement after counsel had been instructed to oppose the rule, and with his consent. I must confess I can see no substantial distinction between the two cases.—p. 70. ARCHIBALD, J. concurred.

DELMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—The learned counsel for the defendants relied upon some strong expressions used by my brother Parke in Phillips v. Evans, which seem to indicate that no mistake of an arbitrator can ever be a sufficient ground for setting aside an award.
 Though fully sensible of the propriety of observing the greatest caution with regard to this subject, to avoid inquiries which would unravel bygone transactions and keep alive the litigation which the parties had hoped to terminate by reference, we cannot think the rule universal, and subject to no exception. It is at most one for guiding our discretion, which cannot be so absolutely fettered and rendered powerless. If awards are allowed to be questioned under any circumstances, it may be difficult to draw a line;
 but a line must be drawn somewhere, and this case will certainly not be found to fall within it, whenever drawn. If the Court might with propriety have refused that application in the first instance, yet the rule having been granted on affidavits clearly setting forth without contradiction a case of gross injustice, which the Court has power to remedy, we ought not to sanction that injustice. It may be observed that Hall and Hinds, In re, is a clear precedent for our taking this course, and is not overruled by the Court of Ex. in Phillips v. Evans, in which the facts were held by Alderson, B., not to be brought satisfactorily before the Court, as they are in this case. Hall and Hinds, In re, is expressly recognised in Hagger v. Baker, where the Court refused to interfere in the judicious observations of the present L.C.B.—p. 958.

 delivered contemporaneously with the award

 Watson, B., whose opinions are entitled to the greatest respect, uses the general word "contemporaneous," by which he means a writing forming part of the award. Neither he nor my Galatti v. Wakefield (1878) 4 Ex. D. 249; 48 L. J. Ex. 70; 40 L. T. 30.—C.A.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—It has been argued that there is no difference between a compulsory reference and a reference by consent, and that notwithstanding the discretion of the arbitrator as to the costs of the award, they follow the event of the cause. In order to establish this proposition, reliance has been placed upon Moore v. Watson: it seems to me that that case is quite distinguishable from that before us; but I desire to add that, as at present advised, I do not agree with the decision. I, however, reserve my judgment until the proper moment has come for determining whether it ought to be overruled.—p. 251.

COLLINS, L.J.—Moore v. Watson was criticised in Galatti v. Wakefield. . . . Moore v. Watson was again referred to by Brett, L.J., in Ferguson v. Dawson (supra). In terms which showed that he did not approve of it. . . . Moore v. Watson having been so treated, and differed from by so great an authority as Bramwell, L.J., I think that Holland v. Vincent, to which we were referred by counsel for the plaintiff, is very material, inasmuch as it is a valuable authority as to the law upon the point we are considering, before the decision of Moore v. Watson, and does not appear to have been cited in that case. . . . In the argument in that case, Waller v. Smith was cited, and Parke, B. disposed of it upon the ground that the question in it was not as to the costs of the reference, but as to costs of the cause. . . . The only other authority to which it is necessary to refer is Forshaw v. De Witte, which is a distinct authority in cases of reference by consent. . . . In that case, again, Moore v. Watson was cited and distinguished as applying only to compulsory references. These are the authorities with which we have to deal in deciding the case before the Court, and it seems to me that the last two cases I have mentioned—the one before and the other subsequent to Moore v. Watson—are, when analysed, inconsistent with the principle of that case, since they are both authorities that the costs of a reference are not a part of the costs of the cause. It is very difficult to see any valid reason why these cases are not as applicable to a reference by compulsion as to a reference by consent. . . . But whether the order was consensual or not, I think that I am right in saying that the opinion expressed by Bramwell, L.J., in Galatti v. Wakefield, clearly not dissented from, and, as far as I can judge, assented to by the other members of the Court, coupled with the way in which Moore v. Watson has been treated, justifies us in saying that even as to a compulsory reference the decision in Moore v. Watson was wrong, and can no longer be looked upon as an authority.—pp. 576–578.

is an action of contract referred to arbitration under an order by consent, the costs to abide the event. . . . In that case the parties had agreed that there should be no costs. The Court did indeed point out that the parties had put themselves under the terms of the Criminal Law Procedure Act, and not under the Judicature Act, but there the order of reference was silent as to costs, and the case is on that ground essentially distinguishable.—p. 245.

MATHEW, J.—The defendant's counsel relied on Gribble v. Buchanan. In that case Jervis, C.J. thought it reasonable that the term "event" should be construed as we propose to construe it, but he thought that the practice was against that construction. He therefore adopted a construction which he thought unreasonable, because he conceived himself to be bound by authority. I am not surprised to find that a more reasonable course has been since adopted by the C. A. in Ellis v. Desilva, and that the Court there held that in a case like this now before us the word "event" must be construed distributively.—p. 844.

Knight v. Coales (1887) 19 Q. B. D. 296; 56 L. J. Q. B. 486; 35 W. R. 675.—C.A.

LOPES, L.J. (for self and FRY, L.J.).—That case has, owing to the language used by some of the judges who decided it, been misunderstood. It was an action for breach of covenant to repair. The defendant denied liability in toto. There was, therefore, a preliminary question of liability to be decided before any question of quantum of damages, or of account, could arise. There was no matter of mere account. If the defendant was found not to be liable, no matter of account ever could arise. Cockburn, C.J., in the course of his judgment, says: "If part of it only is matter of mere account, that part should be directed to be disposed of by arbitration, but that part alone." If he meant there was no power, where part was matter of mere account which could not be conveniently tried in the ordinary way, to refer the whole matter in dispute, we cannot agree with his view, nor is it in accordance with the opinions of the other judges who were parties to the judgment. Brett, L.J. says: "It is not necessary to decide whether an order can be made to refer compulsorily not only what is matter of account but the other part also." Bramwell, L.J., referring to the practice which had long prevailed—viz., when a part was matter of mere account to refer the whole. says that "he does not like to say the practice is wrong;" and both Bramwell, L.J. and Cotton, L.J. confine their judgments to the facts of the case then before them. . . . Bramwell, L.J., in the course of his judgment [Ward v. Pilley], says: "I believe that not long since a notion got abroad that under sect. 3 of the C. L. P. Act [1854] we had power to refer questions only of account, and not other matters, but that mistake we set right in a case which we decided in this Court at the last sittings. . . ." From this expression of opinion Brett, L.J., who delivered a judgment in the same case, and also was a party to the judgment in Clow v. Harper, does not dissent. It is doubtful where the case referred to by Bramwell, L.J. is reported, but it is clear that he considered that matters other than matters of mere account could be referred compulsorily, and that Clow v. Harper was not opposed to that law. . . . We considered in that case [Martin v. Efyfe] that notwithstanding Clow v. Harper it was competent for us to hold that an action may be referred under sect. 3 of the C. L. P. Act, 1854, although the question in dispute does not consist entirely of matters of account. I adhere to the opinion I then expressed.—p. 298.

ESHER, M.R.—For my part, I decline to enter at all upon the discussion as to what Clow v. Harper actually decided. I do not intend to say that anything said or intimated by the late L.C.J. or myself in that case was wrong. I decline to enter upon the discussion, because it is clear to me that if any part of a case can be brought within sect. 3 of the C. L. P. Act, 1854, it follows that it comes within sect. 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873; so that, if any part is a matter of mere account, which can be referred under sect. 3 of the earlier Act, the judge now has power, under sect. 57 of the later Act, to refer all the issues in the cause.—p. 302.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Reliance was placed by counsel for the plaintiff and by the Court below on Dent v. Dent, which was thought to be opposed to Birch v. Birch. But the pension there in question was an Indian Navy retired pension and was not apparently subject to any Indian or English statute which made it inalienable. At all events, if it was in truth inalienable by statute, that circumstance does not appear from the report, and was not present to the mind of the Court. Dent v. Dent, therefore, cannot be regarded as opposed to Birch v. Birch, nor to any other decision in the books. It appears to me, therefore, both on principle and on authority, that the pensions of these defendants, being made inalienable by statute, are not liable to be taken in execution either through an order for a receiver or in any other way.—p. 20.

BACON, C.J.—The distinction between assignments and bills of exchange and orders for payment, is one which has been known for many years, and has been frequently the subject of decision. Diplock v. Hammond was a case in which a document was held to be an assignment of the whole of a fund. The Court declined to force the construction of that document by holding that it was only a bill of exchange. I have no inclination to find fault with the decision in that case, but, in my opinion, it does not govern the present case. The present is a pure case of an order for payment of money out of particular funds, at some future day not then fixed, and, as such, it is liable to be stamped as a bill of exchange, and is an order for payment (even if not strictly a bill of exchange), within the meaning of the Stamp Act.—p. 4.

COCKBURN, C.J. (for self and MELLOR, J.)—The decision of the C. A. in Brice v. Bannister, in favour of the plaintiff on an order similar in its terms to those of the document in the case before us, implies that the Court looked upon the document, not as an order for the payment of money, but as an assignment pro tanto of the debt due from the defendant to the builder. Being ourselves decidedly of opinion that an order from a creditor to his debtor under an ordinary contract for the price of goods, or for work and labour, or the like, to pay a third party, can confer a right on the latter only so far as it operates as an assignment of the debt, we feel ourselves warranted, on the authority of Brice v. Bannister, in acting on that view, notwithstanding the decision in Shellard, Ex parte.—p. 806.

DAY, J.—The only real difficulty which has been raised is with respect to National Provincial Bank v. Harle. It would not be becoming in me to make any other observation on the case than this, viz., that it seems to me distinguishable on the ground mentioned by Pollock, B. in the paragraph of his judgment in which he attaches importance to the introduction of a stipulation or covenant for the reconveyance of the mortgaged premises, and it is possible that that was the turning point of that judgment. I have no doubt of the true construction of the sub-sect. 6 [sect. 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873], and that the plaintiff has a right to sue, as he has done.—p. 350.

A. L. SMITH, J.—After some hesitation in this case I arrive at the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. My main difficulty is to distinguish the case from National Provincial Bank v. Harle, although, no doubt, Pollock, B. does say at the end of his judgment that the proviso for reconveyance sufficiently indicates upon the face of the assignment that it purports to be by way of charge only. But I cannot say that makes a satisfactory distinction between that case and the present one.—p. 351.

CHITTY, L.JJ.—In that case there was an assignment of 100l. out of money due, or to become due, to the assignor under a contract to build a ship, with an express power to give a good discharge to the debtor. Coleridge, C.J. held that the assignment was within sect. 25 [Judicature Act, 1873]. But the C.A. decided the case quite apart from the Act. Cotton, L.J. decided the case on the ground of equitable jurisdiction. That is shown by the opening sentence of his judgment, where he says that the letter was a good equitable assignment. Bramwell, L.J. reluctantly assented to this view. Brett, L.J. dissented, but on general principle. So soon as it was ascertained that there was a good equitable assignment with power to give a discharge, it became unnecessary to consider whether it fell within the Act or not. In Nichols, Ex parte [supra, col. 80], the present M.R., referring to this decision, treated the assignment as an equitable assignment. He said that the decision was founded on the principle that the right of an equitable assignee of a debt cannot be defeated by a voluntary payment by the debtor to the assignor. The decision of Coleridge, C.J. in Brice v. Bannister, that the case fell within sect. 25, appears to me to be open to question. . . . The section speaks of an absolute assignment of any debt or other chose in action. It does not say "or any part of a debt or chose in action" it appears to me, as at present advised, to be questionable whether an assignment of part of an entire debt is within the enactment. If it be, it would seem to leave it in the power of the original creditor to split up the single legal cause of action for the debt into as many separate legal causes of action as he might think fit. However, it is not necessary to decide the point in the present case, and I leave it open for future consideration.—p. 488. A. L. SMITH and COLLINS, L.JJ. concurred.

STIRLING, J.—I am now asked to hold that an assignee who has given notice to all the trustees in existence at the time of his assignment is not entitled to priority over a subsequent assignee who has taken his assignment after the death or retirement of all the trustees, and who gives notice of such assignment to the new trustees. That, as I think, goes beyond the decisions in Timson v. Ramsbottom, and Hall,

In re, for in both those cases the assignee omitted to give notice to a trustee in existence when he took his assignment. The principle on which the doctrine of the Court as to notice is founded was the subject of much discussion in the H. L. in the recent case of Ward v. Duncombe.—p. 118. See judgment at length.

Webb v. Stanton (1883) 52 L. J. Q. B. 584; 11 Q. B. D. 518; 49 L. T. 432.

BRETT, M.R.—I am not at all inclined to say that the order which was made by Hall, V.-C., in Cowan's Estate, In re, was not a right order, because it seems to me that there was an existing debt in that case; and it does not, in my opinion, signify whether it was a legal or an equitable debt, if there was a debt. An order to attach an existing debt is good. But the order is not void because it attempts to include something which does not exist and which cannot be attached by it. The only effect of such an order would be that the parties would be attempting to put it into effect against something which it does not cover. I cannot help seeing, so far as I understand that decision, that Hall, V.-C. came to the conclusion that something might be an accruing debt within the meaning of the rule which was neither a legal nor an equitable debt, payable in presenti, or debitum in presenti, solvendum in futuro. If that be so, I do not agree with him, and I differ from anything in that case which attempts to go beyond what I have stated.—p. 587.

LINDLEY, L.J.—With regard to what has been the practice, I cannot read the decision of Hall, V.-C. in Cowan's Estate, In re, without seeing that he was disposed to attach money which was coming to a trustee. But the V.-C. there had to deal with a somewhat different point: for there was a question of some standing in the Court of

Ch. as to whether money in the possession of a receiver or official liquidator was an attachable debt, and the V.-C. decided that it was. The difficulty there was, that it was supposed to be a contempt of Court to interfere with the Court of Ch.: but the V.-C. said that he saw no objection to attach money in the hands of a receiver: and that decision is right. The question as to whether, under Ord. XLV. r. 2, moneys to become due can be attached by a cestui que trust was discussed: but the V.-C. seemed to assume rather than to consider that they could now be attached. To that extent it seems to me that the decision cannot be supported. . . . The question there [Chatterton v. Watney] was, whether a mortgagee who would be entitled to the proceeds of sale of a mortgage security was such a debtor that the money coming to him from the sale could be attached; and it was held that the surplus proceeds of the sale could be attached.—p. 588.

STIRLING, L.J.—That decision [Turner, Ex parte] is no authority on the present case. What happened there was that an application was made in Chambers to Willes, J., for the garnishee order. The company was indebted to the judgment debtor, and notwithstanding that the company was in liquidation, Willes, J., finding a debt due from the company to the judgment debtor, made an order attaching the money so due in the hands of the company. The order was made, as appears from the report, against the company, and not against the liquidator, and still less against any official of the Board of Trade. The order which has been made here is of a totally different nature. It is in a totally different form from that which was made by Willes, J., and which was the foundation of the application afterwards to the Court of Ch. in Marshall Turner, Ex parte. The order having been made there in proper form, effect was given to it in the winding-up. That is all that was decided in that case.—p. 635.

COLLINS, L.J.—I should add that in Klamber v. Well the whole of the argument was based on the fact that there was in existence a garnishee order, and upon that fact alone. Therefore it has no application here.—p. 636.

JESSEL, M.R.—The reason why I decided in Browning v. Sabin that service of the notice of motion upon the solicitors on the record was sufficient, was, because in a suit service on the solicitor was always treated as service on the party, and, therefore, that mode of service would be "notice to the party" within the meaning of Ord. XLIV. r. 2, which provides that "no notice of attachment shall be issued without the leave of the Court, or a judge, to be applied for on notice to the party against whom the attachment is to be issued."—p. 296.

COTTON, L.J.—It is true that in Mann v. Perry Bacon, V.C., refused to make an order for an attachment without personal service or without some evidence that there was a reason for not making personal service. This last case, however, lays down the true principle, that where there is no difficulty about personal service of a motion to attach, the Court may insist on such service. But where there is a difficulty in effecting personal service of the notice, and the original order has been personally served, then it would be wrong for the Court to refuse to act on proof of service in the ordinary form on the party's solicitor. It is a very different matter when the attachment is asked against some one who is not a party to the action; there the service must be personal, as he has no solicitor upon the record.—p. 99. That was all those cases decided; they did not decide that it was no irregularity to serve the affidavits separately from the notice of motion, and in my opinion it is undoubtedly an irregularity not to serve the affidavits with the notice of motion.—p. 177.

LINDLEY, L.J.—As a matter of convenience and discretion, however, it is desirable that the master [in January] should refer such applications to this Court, in order that a matter involving the liberty of the subject may be dealt with judicially in open Court. COZENS-HARDY, J.—Having regard to the settled practice of giving an undertaking in the terms of a notice of motion, it would be highly dangerous to hold that a defendant who has given an undertaking could disregard it unless and until the order was served. I do not think that Kekewich, J. intended to intimate a contrary opinion in Halford v. Hardy. . . . It is somewhat strange that there is no express authority as to what is the proper mode of enforcing an undertaking as distinct from an order. The question arose in Callow v. Young. In that case a motion was made before Chitty, J. on Nov. 19th, 1886, for leave to issue an attachment for breach of a negative undertaking, and leave was granted. It appears, however, that the order was stopped on the ground that commitment was the proper remedy, not attachment—a point which had not been taken in argument. The motion was brought on again on Feb. 11th, 1887. Chitty, J., after argument, gave leave to amend the notice of motion by asking in the alternative for commitment, and directed the motion to be served again. I think this amounted to a decision that where the undertaking is in form negative, attachment is not the proper remedy. Had there been an injunction instead of an undertaking, commitment would under the old law have been the only remedy, and the decision may have proceeded on that ground. It does not seem necessarily to cover the case of an undertaking which is positive in form. On principle, however, I think that, except in a case falling within Ord. XLII. r. 7, attachment can only issue for breach of an order of the Court commanding the respondent to do a certain act, and that in the numerous cases where there is a contempt, not arising from non-compliance with such an order of the Court, the only remedy is by commitment. This is the view expressed in Mr. Registrar Lavie's memorandum printed in a note to the report of Evans, In re, which is stated by Bowen, L.J., to represent the practice accurately. I adopt that view, and hold that an undertaking, whether positive or negative, must be enforced by commitment and not by attachment.—p. 384.

FROMER, J.—With regard to Turner v. Hookey, it appears to me that, if it is to be supported, it must be on the ground that the learned Judges took the view, on the facts before them, that the auctioneer had done nothing but act as a mere conduit pipe; but if the facts are rightly reported I doubt if, on those facts, I should personally have come to the conclusion they appear to have arrived at.—p. 371.

COLLINS, J.—In my opinion, if delivery under the contract be assumed, the proposition stated in the headnote (of Turner v. Hockey) is not law. It seems to me to be in direct conflict both with principle and authority. It was questioned by Romer, J., in Barker v. Furlong, and it is observed upon in Messrs. Clerk and Linsell's valuable Treatise on Torts at p. 171. . . . I think the headnote goes far beyond the decision of the Court, though some of the observations of Day, J., might seem to support it. . . . It does not clearly appear. . . . that the defendant, in fact, did more than submit an offer; the bargain may have been concluded and the sale effected by Phillips and the purchaser without further intervention on the part of the defendant, and in this view the case would be exactly within The National Mercantile Bank v. Ryndell (44 L. T. 767), and Wills, J., seems so to have regarded it, as he treats it, as covered by the illustration . . . put by Bramwell, L.J., in Cockrane v. Ryndell (27 W. R. 776). The decision of the Court, therefore, does not support the headnote, and the case is no authority for the now defendant. On the other hand, the decision of Romer, J. [in Barker v. Furlong], above cited, is directly in point, save that there the sale took place in a public room, which, as pointed out in . . . Williams v. Millington (H. Bl. 81) . . . can make no difference.—p. 326.

(for the Court).—The first part of the marginal note in Coppin v. Walker is not justified by the decision; and in the very next reportable case, of Coppin v. Craig, the Court appears to have expressed an opinion that the auctioneer "had a lien as well on the proceeds of the sale as the specific article sold."—p. 957.

HERSHELL, L.C.—In Tod v. Merchant Banking Co., the bank, who were the pledgees, never did deliver at any time to any person to hold for them as their agent. The only deliveries which they ever made in that case were deliveries to a purchaser, who received the goods, not for the bank, but to hold from the moment of receipt as owner under the purchase. I confess I am at a loss to see how a case which deals with facts such as I have described can be held to be an authority for the proposition that the delivery of goods by a pledge, to a pledgor or his agent puts an end to the pledge.—p. 31.

LORD BLACKBURN.—It was argued that over-drawing a bank account, or, as it was called, taking advantage of banking facilities, was not like other kinds of borrowing, and two decisions of Stuart, V.-C., In re Cefn Cilcen Mining Co. and Waterlow v. Sharp, were cited as authorities for that. I am not sure that I quite understand how far the V.-C. meant to go, but if he did mean thus in any sense that would affect the present case I cannot agree with him. If any one is going to give authority to pledge his credit, it might be prudent to limit that authority to borrowing from the bank where he kept his account, as the authority would in that case be less likely to be abused; and when framing the rules, if any power to borrow was to be given by them, it might be prudent to limit it to a power of borrowing from the banker's only, and only by over-drawing the banking account; but I cannot see that borrowing is the less borrowing because it is from the bankers.—p. 865.

BYRNE, J.—I am asked to say that that amounts to a decision to this effect—that wherever there is an account which on the face of it is a trust account, and the customer draws a cheque upon that trust account and pays in the cheque to the credit of his own private account, the bankers are bound to see and enquire . . . whether the customer is in point of fact entitled to the money which he so transfers from one account to another. I do not think that that was the meaning of the learned judge in that case. If the bankers have the slightest knowledge or reasonable suspicion that the money is being applied in breach of a trust, and if they are going to derive a benefit from the transfer and intend and design that they should derive a benefit from it, then I think they would not be entitled to honour the cheque drawn upon the trust account without some further enquiry into the matter. But the present case is not that case at all.—p. 568.

LORD CRANWORTH.—I should be very sorry that what fell from me in this case should be misunderstood. When I said that there might be circumstances of fraud or negligence that would vary the case, what I meant was, that there might be negligence in the circumstances that were the immediate cause of the payment by the bank, as in the case decided in the Common Pleas (Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253; 12 Moore 484), where, when a cheque had been drawn payable to bearer, "fifty pounds," and it had been so badly written, or there had been so large a blank left on the left-hand side of the "fifty," that the person who got hold of it was enabled to put in "three hundred and," the Court held, that as that negligence on the part of the drawer had afforded the opportunity for that fraud, which the bank could not have discovered by ordinary diligence, they were absolved from the ordinary liability attaching to the payment of a forged cheque.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—In Ex parte Unity Banking Association, the decision was that where there had been an express representation by an infant trader that he was of full age, the person to whom the representation had been made might prove for the loss which he had sustained under an adjudication made against the trader after he had attained full age. The question was not whether an adjudication could be made. Therefore that case is no authority for supporting the adjudication in the present case, if considered as based upon strictly bankruptcy proceedings. (p. 123). The chief judge has really acted upon his previous decision in Ex parte Lynch, and I entirely concur with what the Master of the Rolls has said with regard to the case.—p. 124. LUSH, L.J. concurred.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—Then we have to consider whether there is anything in the decision in Ex parte McGeorge, which prevents us from holding that the non-payment of debts incurred by a married woman while trading separately, is evidence that she is still continuing to trade. That was a decision under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, upon the meaning of the words "being a trader." There had been an earlier decision—Ex parte Solomonberg (L. R. 10 Ch. 172)—upon the same words, "being a trader," occurring in another part of the same Act, and Jessel, M.R. in following that decision, pointed out that the older cases decided under the earlier Bankruptcy Acts were not binding upon him, the words to be construed in those cases being different—"using the trade of merchandise." In the same way, I think we are entitled to say that the decision in Ex parte McGeorge is not binding on us as to the meaning of the words "carrying on a trade" in the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.

THESIGER, L.J.—It is said that Philps v. Hornstedt (which was also a decision of the Exchequer Chamber) is contrary to the view taken in Woodhouse v. Murray, and is at all events an authority in favour of the respondents. It is very difficult to distinguish the two cases, but if they cannot be distinguished. Philps v. Hornstedt is clearly contrary to the principle of Woodhouse v. Murray, and that being so, and both of them being decisions of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with our own, I prefer to follow that decision, which proceeded upon facts almost identical with those of the present case, to that which proceeded upon very different facts.—p. 326.

BRAMWELL, B.—It was ingeniously argued that a conveyance of a trader's effects to a particular creditor, necessarily defeated and delayed the body of his creditors, and was therefore necessarily an act of bankruptcy. On that point that case must be taken to have been overruled by Hutton v. Cruttwell (1 El. & Bl. 15; 22 L. J. Q. B. 78) although the Court said they did not do so.—p. 199.

WILLES, J.—The decision in this case occasioned some surprise in the profession. Taking the judgment literally, it seems to be based on the assumption that the deed passed the advance itself, but it looks very much as if the Court took a different view of the transaction from the jury and thought there never was any bona fide intention that the £200 should pass (p. 110).

I think that in dealing with the case of Graham v. Chapman, we must take it to have turned on the particular terms of the deed, and the mode in which the advance was there made; and that though there was an advance in point of form, it came into the hands of the debtor under such circumstances that he did not get the real enjoyment of the money so advanced, and that on these grounds it was put out of consideration. Wherever the same special reasons apply, no doubt the Court must act on that decision, until it shall be reconsidered by some higher tribunal, but we ought not to extend the effect of it beyond what was precisely decided.—p. 113.

Graham v. Chapman, overruled.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Then it is said that, quite apart from the Bills of Sale Act, this bill of sale was an act of bankruptcy, and that is a much more formidable question. The bill of sale did in substance assign to the sureties for their security the whole of the grantor's property. It enabled them to seize everything which he had. It is contended that that is an act of bankruptcy, first, by reason of the decision in Graham v. Chapman, which, it is said, shows that if a bill of sale is so worded as to enable the grantee to seize, not merely all the property of the grantor, but all his property including that which may be bought by him by means of the advance then made to him, it is necessarily a net of bankruptcy. Well, if Graham v. Chapman had decided that, it appears to me that it is distinctly wrong. It has been so considered ever since it was decided. I do not say that the decision was wrong, because I am not sure that it is not open to the explanation which was given of it by Willes, J., in Louisa v. Buxton (supra). He says (on p. 113), "I think that in dealing with the case of Graham v. Chapman we must take it to have turned on the particular terms of the deed, and the mode in which the advance was there made, and that though there was an advance in point of form, it came into the hands of the debtor under such circumstances that he did not get the real enjoyment of the money so advanced." If that is, that which purported to be an advance was not an advance at all, and then one can understand the decision in Graham v. Chapman. But, so far as Graham v. Chapman is supposed to be an authority to the effect that a bill of sale, in the form there used, is necessarily bad, it appears to me that Graham v. Chapman has been dissented from and overruled, and cannot be supported. —p. 637. FRY, L.J. agreed.

THESIGER, L.J.—The principles laid down in Mercer v. Peterson are undoubtedly binding upon this Court, but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that their application in any particular case ought to be most carefully guarded, because it cannot be disputed that they do, unless they are applied with very great caution and under the most careful limitations, open the door to very considerable frauds. It appears to me, therefore, right that the Court should require from any person setting up a bill of sale executed under such circumstances as those which exist in the present case, very clear evidence that the agreement which is set up for the purpose of rendering the bill of sale valid, was a bona fide agreement; or, in other words, using the expression of Mellish, L.J., in Ex parte Fisher (at p. 644), that it was not an agreement that the bill of sale was to be delayed until such time as the trader should be in a state of insolvency, in order to prevent the destruction to his credit which would result from the registration. I think that the decision in Ex parte Fisher supplied a most wholesome corrective to the dangers, which, as it seems to me may arise from the principles laid down in Mercer v. Peterson, and that we ought to apply the doctrines laid down by Mellish, L.J., to their full extent, and to require, in this and similar cases, a very clear explanation of the reason why the giving of the bill of sale was delayed.—p. 256.

HERSCHELL, L.C.—The learned Chief Justice in the Supreme Court [of New South Wales] relied much on the case of In re Ash, Ex parte Fisher. . . In the case relied on the bill of sale was given by an insolvent person without any present advance, and of itself could not avail the grantee. He invoked the aid of a prior promise made at the time of the advance; but, for the reasons there given, the Court held that he could not derive any benefit from this promise.

In the case under appeal, the bill of sale was granted in respect of a present advance by a person not shown to be insolvent. The title of the grantee was then complete, and did not depend upon his taking possession, though, owing to his not doing so, the provisions of the Bills of Sale Act might in certain events have deprived him of his security, beyond this his title was unaffected by it.

JAMES, L.J.—His lordship at first thought that Ex parte Foxley was an authority, showing that book debts were not to be taken into consideration in estimating the value of the property of a trader. But, when the case was examined, it was clear that it laid down nothing of the kind. The judges, having regard to the amount of the property which was assigned, the amount which was reserved, and all the circumstances, considered that the debtor had made the assignment with an actual intent to defeat and delay his creditors, and, in coming to that conclusion, they took into consideration the value of the book debts, and they held that the taking of a new bill of sale upon an agreement not to enforce an old one did not of itself supply any new consideration for the assignment. The decision did not in any way interfere with what had always been considered to be the law applicable to such cases.—p. 107, n.

ESHER, M.R.—In the case of In re Woodall a bankruptcy notice was allowed to be served by an executrix; but in the case of In re Keeling it was refused to an assignee. There appears to be no valid distinction between an assignee by act of parties and a trustee in bankruptcy. The position of a trustee in bankruptcy is not the same as that of an executor. The principle of In re Woodall ought not to be extended.—p. 3.

COTTON, L.J.—Ex parte Chinery, which related to a garnishee order, has no bearing on the present case. In that case, if the order was a final order, it certainly was not a judgment. When a new act of bankruptcy is created by the legislature we ought to give to their words their strict meaning. I should say no more but for the fact that the decision of the learned registrar seems to have been founded upon a misapprehension of some expressions used in my judgment in Ex parte Chinery. In order to decide whether a garnishee order was a final judgment we had to consider what was the meaning of the expression "final judgment." It is a judgment in an action between parties brought to establish some right of the plaintiff against the defendant. In giving judgment in that case I made use of these words: "I think we ought to give to the words 'final judgment' in this sub-section their strict and proper meaning, i.e., a judgment obtained in an action by which a previously-existing liability of the defendant to the plaintiff is ascertained or established, unless there is something to show an intention to use the words in a more extended sense." If a defendant has committed a tort, there is a previously-existing liability on his part to the plaintiff. So here there was a previously-existing liability of the defendant arising out of his covenant contained in the partnership deed. He undertook not to carry on business as a solicitor within certain limits of space; he had broken that agreement, and his liability in respect of that breach was established by the judgment. Taking the very words of my judgment they apply exactly to this case. Of course, the order for the payment of costs did not enforce a pre-existing liability of the defendant, but that order is part of a final judgment which did. I do not wish in any way to qualify what I said in Ex parte Chinery—p. 634.

FRY, L.J.—There is . . . no pretence for saying that the order [against a husband for payment of alimony pendente lite] is "final" or that it is a judgment [within sect. 4, sub-sect. 1 (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883]. The argument was rested mainly upon Ex parte Moore, but it is founded upon a total misapprehension of what that case decided. In that case there was a final judgment, which determined not merely a subordinate issue, but the matter which was in contest in the action. That judgment directed an inquiry as to damages, and it was contended that the fact that the inquiry was directed prevented the remainder of the judgment from being "final." The answer to the argument was this. It is a judgment which finally determines the rights of the parties with regard to the main contest in the action, and its "final" nature is not altered by its directing an inquiry which would not be followed by any further judgment of the Court.—p. 511.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This case is not at all on all fours with that of In re Bates, because this bankruptcy notice is doubly wrong. It was wrong at the time of its issue [in requiring payment of £219 when only £200 was due], in such a way that no amendment could put it right at all, and it was wrong at the time of its service [£45 having previously been paid]. It seems to me, therefore, that In re Bates does not govern this case. Then again . . . In re Bates goes very far indeed, when it says that a mistake of £20 in a notice is a mere formal defect. . . . What it decided in principle was not that every mistake in a bankruptcy notice rendered that bankruptcy notice so defective that no act of bankruptcy could be committed. I accept that principle. But in my opinion, the £45 in the circumstances of this case was not a mere formal mistake, and the amendment ought not to have been made. The decision of the registrar must therefore be set aside and this appeal allowed.—p. 500.

ESHER, M.R.—The debtor has not paid the judgment debt, nor is he able to pay it, and a judgment debtor in that situation ought to be made a bankrupt. Proceedings for it to have been taken. A bankruptcy notice has been served on the debtor. The form of the bankruptcy notice follows the judgment. [His lordship read the notice, which was in the name of the company, and required the debtor to pay the debt to, or to secure or compound for it to the satisfaction of the liquidator of the creditor company, who acted under a committee of inspection.]

It is said that that bankruptcy notice is bad, but it follows the form of the judgment, and is in the name of the company. If the notice had been by the liquidator alone without naming the company, or as liquidator of the company, that would have been informal. But there was neither of these defects. The person who drew the notice was evidently aware of the decision in In re Winterbottom, Ex parte Winterbottom.—p. 40.

JESSEL, M.R.—What, then, is the law on the subject? It is laid down in Ex parte Sewell. There there was a bona fide dispute as to a debt, and the Court was of opinion that there was no reason for doubting the debtor's solvency. And James, L.J. said: "I think the proper order to make will be to stay the proceedings on the summons, on the terms of the appellant's bringing the sum claimed into Court to abide the result of an action." In that case only a small sum was claimed; when the sum is a large one, the practice is to require security, not payment into Court. Baggallay and Thesiger, L.J.J., concurred in that order. It is true Thesiger, L.J. added: "I assent to that only because it appears to be in accordance with previous decisions of this Court in cases in which the weight of the evidence is in favour of the creditor. But for those decisions I should have thought that the proceedings ought to be stayed unconditionally, though the creditor may be within his strict right in issuing the summons; yet I think the provisions of the Act were not intended to apply where the debtor is solvent and has a bona fide defence to the claim." Thesiger, L.J., therefore, agreed in the proposed order, because he thought he was bound by the previous decisions. That is the law on the subject, and I think it applies exactly to the present case.—p. 314.

THESIGER, L.J.—It appears to me that the payment of the money into Court under the order of the Court was equivalent to a conditional payment to the creditor. If the money had been actually paid to him under the order of the Court he would have been entitled to keep it, and I think the payment into Court was, when his debt was established, equivalent to a payment to him as of the date when the payment into Court was made. This conclusion is the legitimate consequence of the considered judgment of this Court in Ex parte Wier. Ex parte Jay was different from the present case for this reason, that there was no fund for the security of the particular creditor; there were only funds in the hands of the receiver for the benefit of the creditors generally.—p. 30.

ESHER, M.R.—It is said that the case is governed by Ex parte Harris. The headnote to that case [in 2 Ch. D. 423] is, "A receiver in Chancery can issue a debtor's summons in respect of a sum due to him in that character." Is that general proposition justified by the judgment? Bacon, C.J. said, "It is the receiver's duty to receive and get in the estate. He gives security for the due discharge of his duty. He is bound to get in all that can be recovered." Those propositions are perfectly right, but no conclusion is drawn from them in the judgment. But the learned judge went on: "He claims, too, as the holder of a bill of exchange." That made all the difference. If the receiver was the holder of a bill of exchange, that would give him a right to sue at law in his own name. That judgment, therefore, really was that the receiver in that particular case was a good petitioning creditor, because he was the holder of a bill of exchange, and consequently by the law merchant he might have sued on it and recovered the money in his own name, holding the money, when he had got it, as a trustee. . . . If Ex parte Harris did determine what the headnote says it did, I can only say that I do not think it was rightly decided. But I do not think it was decided on that ground.—p. 183.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I was a little impressed at first with the case of Patterson v. Patterson, which has been referred to, but I confess I look upon that case not without considerable doubt as to the power of the Court to make such an order as was there made. I say this with the most profound respect, which I always have, for the very sound judgments of Sir James Hannen. As I understand the law, it is impossible to say that a person shall be made the organ or the instrument for receiving the money to be brought into Court, and that that can constitute him a person capable of proving for the debt. But passing that by, it is sufficient, I think, to say that that case does not in any way meet the present, because that was a case in which all that was done was to enable the party to prove. Whether that ought not to have been done in the Court of Bankruptcy, if done at all, is, I think, a very serious question. I entertain considerable doubt whether the Divorce Court had the power which it assumed to exercise in that case. This is not, however, the present case. There the order was wanted merely for the purpose of proof. That is very different from constituting a person a good petitioning creditor. A person may be appointed to prove who is not in the position of a petitioning creditor.—p. 305.

WRIGHT, J.—At first I thought that it [the above case] expressly applied to the present case, but when it is looked at it is only a case turning on the sufficiency of the petitioning creditor's debt. I do not think it is an authority on the question of redemption, because the attention of the Court there was not called to the point raised in the present case. I think, therefore, that it is not an authority for the proposition for which it is cited in the text-books—namely, that where a debtor is adjudicated bankrupt on a petition of a secured creditor, the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to redeem the security at the amount of the petitioner's estimate.—p. 374.

JAMES, L.J.—Before I make some observations upon these two sections, I will refer to the case of Williams v. Harding, in the House of Lords, in which the noble and learned lords came to the conclusion that a man who had contracted a debt before the change in the law was not to be liable to this new law; that if the contract was a contract before this Act, he was not to be liable. This matter was not before them at the time, but they made use of the term "before the passing of the Act," because they considered it hard that a man should be liable for a debt which he so contracted without having noticed that the change in the law was about to take effect, or that there was about to be a change in the law. But no such reason would apply to a man who, after the passing of the Act, knows that in the month of October he will be liable to be made a bankrupt in respect of any debt that he then owed. There would be no hardship in so construing the Act of 1861.

ESHER, M.R.—The case of Ex parte Kibble is a direct authority of the Court of Appeal, that, under such circumstances, a judgment debt may be incurred into at the instance of the debtor when he is disputing whether an adjudication ought to be made or not. Not only is that case a binding authority upon us, but it was rightly decided upon principle, and the principle is that the Court of Bankruptcy has a right to see that it is not put in motion when there is no petitioning creditor's debt at all.

FRY, L.J.—I entirely agree with what was said by the Master of the Rolls in In re Saville: "It seems to me that the case of Ex parte Lennox shows that the mere fact of a judgment having been recovered, does not prevent the Court of Bankruptcy, if sufficient reasons are given for doing so, from going behind the judgment. But it does not decide that, there being a judgment, on the mere suggestion of the debtor that the judgment is bad, the Court of Bankruptcy is bound to go behind the judgment and inquire into the validity of the debt." In the present case I think no "sufficient cause" was shown calling on the registrar to inquire into the validity of the debt.—p. 86.

ESHER, M.R.—Then it is said that the petition is an abuse of the process of the Court, because there are no assets available—they have all been assigned for the benefit of creditors under the deed of arrangement. But that argument is not conclusive, and for this reason. The bankrupt will not get his discharge for two years, and may possibly not get it for five years, and in that time it is impossible to say that a person in the position of the debtor here may not get something to pay his debts. In re Otway was a wholly different case.—p. 41.

ESHER, M.R.—In re Otway is no authority for the proposition that the fact of there possibly or probably being no assets to be administered in bankruptcy, is a reason sufficient of itself for refusing to make an adjudication of bankruptcy. In that case, it being ascertained that a receiving order would deprive the debtor of the only asset available for the payment of a composition which he proposed to pay upon his debts; it was held that that was a sufficient reason why the Court in the exercise of its discretion should not make a receiving order. There was also in that case the additional fact that the petitioning creditor had endeavoured to obtain money from the debtor as a condition of his agreeing to the adjournment of the petition, and the Court came to the conclusion that the petitioning creditor was using the petition for the purpose of extorting money and committing a fraud on the bankruptcy laws; and they therefore held that, on a petition so presented, they ought not to make an order.—p. 473.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—It is contended on behalf of the debtor that a receiving order ought not to be made, on the ground that in all probability the costs of the bankruptcy proceedings will exceed the sum of £20, which is alleged to be about the amount of the available assets, and so nobody will get anything. . . . It is contended on behalf of the respondent that the case of In re Betts, Ex parte Betts, is a decision which supports the proposition to which I have referred. But if that case is looked at, it is apparent that this was by no means the ground of the decision. . . . The real ground was that, on the information which they had before them, the Court thought that there were no assets, and that there was no probability of there ever being any assets which would be available, because there was already a previous bankruptcy in existence, under which the debtor was still undischarged, and there was nothing in the circumstances of the case to prevent them from exercising their discretion by refusing to make a receiving order.

ESHER, M.R.—We are bound by the decision of this Court in Ex parte Cunningham, which, if I may say so, I think was a right decision. The burden of proving the jurisdiction of the Court, under both sect. 6 and sect. 95, lies on the petitioning creditor. What amount of evidence will be sufficient to make out a prima facie case under either section it is not necessary now to determine. The language used by Baggallay, L.J. in Ex parte Cunningham, must, I think, be interpreted with reference to the particular facts of that case; it was there assumed by every one that the debtor's birth domicile was in Ireland. If the burden of proof be that the debtor's domicile was English lay originally on the petitioning creditor, it certainly lay more heavily on him if the debtor's domicile of origin was in Ireland. The language of Baggallay, L.J., cannot be criticised as applied to that state of facts. The only question is, how much evidence the petitioning creditor is bound in the first instance to adduce in order to shift the burden of proof? It would be contrary to the practice of the Court and to the necessity of the case that the petitioning creditor should be bound to go to the Court with evidence to prove that the debtor is a born Englishman, if it has been assumed by both parties throughout the proceedings that he is.—p. 524.

ESHER, M.R.—I cannot myself see anything obscure in the judgments in Ex parte Carr, but probably there is, because Cave, J., seems to have thought so. I think that Ex parte Carr laid down this, that the rescission of a receiving order is a matter for the discretion of the Court, and when the registrar, or the judge, or the Divisional Court, has exercised the discretion, this Court will pause long before it interferes. I think that Ex parte Carr also laid down that, in exercising its discretion, the Court of Appeal must in each case have all the facts before it, and it will then upon a consideration of the facts say whether the discretion has or has not been rightly exercised by the Court below. I think that is right.—p. 637.

JAMES, L.J.—The next objection is a more serious one, as to the application of Ex parte Pooley (L. R. 3 Ch. 722) and Ex parte Orde, viz.: what is to be done with persons who are present at a meeting, but who do not sign the resolutions as voting in favour of them? We held in Ex parte Orde that such persons must be considered as present at the meeting, and be reckoned in the total number of creditors present and voting, unless they withdraw their proofs as provided by rule 273 (Bankruptcy Rules, 1870). Without saying how far that decision would apply to Mr. Scrivener, personally, with regard to such a meeting as this, it appears to me quite clear that the principle cannot apply to the case of a creditor who is represented by another creditor as his proxy. I am of opinion that the principle does not apply to the case of a person who is said to have been present in that way. Such a person is not personally present, and in what way does it appear that the proxy remained in force? The creditor who is present might intend to be present on his own behalf, and not on behalf of his principal.—p. 427.

MELLISH, L.J.—It is to be observed that in Ex parte Cobb the question had been put to the meeting, and the creditors had deliberately determined that they did not desire to have liquidation or composition; and it was in reference to that state of things that James, L.J., says, "I have great doubt whether such a meeting has any validity. I can conceive that where a first meeting is shown to have been no meeting at all, for instance, from the absence of proper advertisements, it might be the duty of the Court to direct a fresh first meeting to be held; but to say that because the debtor finds that he could not do what he wanted to do at the first meeting, or because one of the creditors had changed his mind, that is a reason for holding a fresh first meeting, seems to me a confusion of terms." The Lord Justice does not consider the question what would be the duty of the Court, if in consequence of the non-compliance of the debtor with something which he ought to do at a meeting, the meeting has gone off. But in Ex parte Cockayne, which was a case very similar to the present, the chief judge appears to have thought that under certain circumstances a new meeting might be called; for he says that the dismissal of the appeal is to be without prejudice to a second first meeting.—p. 385.

BRETT, L.J.—I meant that the mere fact that there was a difference of opinion between the Court and the creditors would not be a sufficient ground for setting aside their resolution. I was not referring to the question of jurisdiction.—p. 400.

[N.B.—Ex parte Staff and Ex parte Elworthy were cited as conflicting on the question of registration, and the Court, though it did not mention them in the judgments, decided in accordance with Ex parte Staff.]

BAGGALLAY, L.J. (for the Court).—This Court was of opinion [in Walter, Ex parte] that, according to the true construction of rule 301 (Bankruptcy Rules, 1870), the passing of the resolution was intended to be conclusive evidence upon the application to register that the debtor's statement of affairs was sufficient, and that the rule had the effect of excluding, upon an application for registration, the raising of any such question as was raised before Mr. Registrar Keene. Though, however, the Court arrived at this conclusion in Walter, Ex parte, in which the statement of affairs was upon the face of it sufficient, it recognised the distinction between such a case and one in which the statement might be upon the face of it insufficient, and in illustration of this distinction referred to Cockayne, Ex parte (supra), and Gibbs, Ex parte (supra), in which cases it was held that, where the debtor has not in his statement distinguished between his joint and separate debts and assets, a resolution founded on that statement ought not to be registered.—p. 716.

JAMES, L.J.—It appears to me impossible to find any sound distinction between the present case and Ex parte Early. In Ex parte Staff and Ex parte Russell, the Court came to the conclusion that the resolutions had not been passed in the interest of the creditors, that in fact they had no interest in the matter. In Ex parte Early, the creditors had an interest in getting the whole of the assets distributed among themselves, and in preventing them being all taken by one creditor who had levied an execution. Their contest was not in favour of the debtor, but in favour of themselves. It appears to me that we cannot say that the present case is not exactly the same, and I cannot see any ground for a distinction between it and Ex parte Early.—p. 659.

JAMES, L.J.—In the case of Wilson v. Lloyd, the chief judge held that a surety was discharged by the creditor voting in favour of accepting a composition from the principal debtor. There were, however, a great many points in that case; and we think that the difference between a composition by a voluntary deed or agreement and a composition under the Bankruptcy Act was not sufficiently considered. On the other hand, in the case of Megrath v. Gray, the Court of Common Pleas appear to have come after great consideration to a directly contrary conclusion. . . . We entirely agree in the decision of the Court of Common Pleas and in the reasons they have given for it.—p. 213.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of opinion that this decision of the chief judge is an extension of the doctrine laid down in Ex parte Carew which we ought not to sanction even if that doctrine goes to the full extent which has been suggested. In the present case there is no property to be administered, and no proceedings pending; there is nothing now to be done in the composition except to enforce a personal demand against a debtor. I am of opinion that the Court of Bankruptcy has no jurisdiction to entertain a merely personal demand against a debtor, there being no property for the Court to administer. When the judgment of Lord Justice Mellish, in Ex parte Carew, was read to us, a judgment in which I appear to have concurred, it did not strike my mind as something I was prepared to accept. It must, however, be read with reference to the facts of that particular case (p. 187). . . . And it was held by the Court that it had jurisdiction to determine upon the debtor's claim to the surplus, and it refused to hand it over to him while the validity of the claim, to meet which a fund had been placed in the hands of trustees, had not been ascertained. That was the whole of the decision. And what Lord Justice Mellish really said, was that the creditor whose claim had not been admitted, might waive the condition which was imposed by sect. 126 [of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869] for his benefit, and come in and bind himself by the composition while the thing remained still in fieri and incomplete. That was, as I understand it, the view of Lord Rafterley in Breslauner v. Brown, and it was assented to by Lord Blackburn, and that is to say, that a creditor whose debt was not admitted, might come in and accept the composition during the pending of the proceedings. . . . In Breslauner v. Brown, the creditor had already accepted the composition in respect of one debt, and he then claimed the payment of another debt which had not been inserted in the debtor's statement. His acceptance in respect of the first debt could not entitle the debtor to say that he had bound himself by the composition in respect of the second debt, and therefore it was held that he was still a creditor, and entitled to sue the debtor for the second debt.—p. 138.

BRAMWELL, B.—Two cases have decided that an action is maintainable for the original debt after the debtor has made default in paying an instalment of the composition. But if so, it is said this action must also be maintainable, because if it can be barred now it is barred for ever, upon the principle of Ford v. Beech. Now, I agree with the judgment in that case that a suspension of a right of action cannot be a defence, for if it were the action would be gone for ever, and I feel a difficulty in understanding the observation upon the re-vesting of causes of action by Blackburn, J., in Jeffs v. Day (L. R. 1 Q. B. 372, at p. 374). At the same time I do not think that the authorities cited, coupled with Ford v. Beech, are conclusive. Certainly in In re Hutton, Mellish, L.J., does not say that the resolution would not be a bar to proceedings commenced before default; and in Edwards v. Coombe, Willes, J., indicates that his opinion was the contrary. I think, therefore, we can assent to these two decisions, and yet hold the pleas good thus: Either this resolution is equivalent to an accord and satisfaction defeasible by matter subsequent, and when the event happens whereby it is defeated (i.e., the debtor's default) a cause of action accrues or else the composition resolution contains two implied terms, one by the creditors that all will forbear to sue until default, the other by the debtor, that in case he fails to pay the composition at the time agreed, he will pay the whole debt.—p. 194.

BRETT, J.—I think it necessary to add some few remarks on the subject to what my lord has said, because a case has just been brought to my notice which was not discussed in the argument, viz., the case of Slater v. Jones, which was decided in the Court of Exchequer, subsequently to both the two cases that have been referred to, and in which they were both commented upon. There the creditor brought his action for the original debt, and there was a plea of a composition under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, to which the plaintiff replied that the time for the payment of the composition had not arrived. The Court of Exchequer seem to have had the difficulty urged upon them, that if the decision in Edwards v. Coombe was, that according to the common law the right of action was suspended, it would follow that the debt was gone for ever. The Court said that they did not think it necessary to dissent from Edwards v. Coombe, and Bramwell, B., says; "I think we can assent to both decisions and yet hold the plea good, thus: either this resolution is equivalent to an accord and satisfaction defeasible by matter subsequent, and when the event happens, whereby it is defeated (i.e., the debtor's default), a cause of action accrues, or else the composition resolution contains two implied terms, one by the creditors that all will forbear to sue until default, the other by the debtor, that in case he fails to pay the composition at the time agreed, he will pay the whole debt." It seems to me that we need not disagree with what was said by the Exchequer in Slater v. Jones, any more than they dissented from the decision in Edwards v. Coombe. It seems to me that the decision in Edwards v. Coombe turned upon the construction of the Bankruptcy Act, and not on the common law doctrine of the suspension of a remedy; that the meaning of the statute was that the creditor should not be entitled to go on with an action until the composition was due, and that if paid when due it should extinguish the debt; but that, if it were not paid, it should be just as if there had been no composition, and the creditor should be entitled to the usual remedies, and be generally in the same position as if the resolution for the composition had never passed.—p. 101.

SELBORNE, L.C.—I am not prepared to say that, under the special circumstances of that case, there may not have been extremely good reasons for that conclusion. But it is to be observed that there the Court was not reversing the registrar's decision, but was declining to disturb his order. JESSEL, M.R.—I agree that if the debtor had been guilty of gross misconduct, we ought not to give him a new chance of escaping bankruptcy, and that, I think, is the explanation of the refusal of the Court, in Ex parte Best, to allow a fresh meeting of the creditors to be summoned. The lord chancellor thought that the debtor had been guilty of a fraudulent preference; that material facts had been concealed from the creditors; and that the creditor who had examined the debtor at one of the meetings had been intimidated.—p. 287.

JAMES, J.—The decision in Revell v. Blake was quite consistent with this view. There it was held that the adjudication itself was conclusive evidence that the Court which made it had jurisdiction in the case, but that where the adjudication was founded on an act of bankruptcy which could be committed equally, whether the bankrupt was a trader or not, there was nothing in the Act to prevent the trustee from showing that, though the bankrupt had been described as a non-trader, he was really a trader. [The Court of Appeal held that, by the operation of the 10th and 11th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, an adjudication of bankruptcy is, so long as it stands conclusive as against third persons, that the act of bankruptcy on which the adjudication was founded was in fact committed, but a third person whose title to property is affected by the adjudication is entitled to appeal from the adjudication, being a "person aggrieved" by it within the meaning of the 71st section of the Act.]

There the words used were, "part with the property"—a very general and loose expression, indeed—and it was held that those words were sufficiently complied with, because there was the presentation of a petition, upon which it was open to the Court to appoint a receiver of all or any part of the debtor's property, and the learned vice-chancellor said, that that was a parting with his property, because he had done something which enabled the Court to take possession of all which belonged to him. It is obvious that the words used there pointed at something very different from assigning your property, or vesting your property, in some one else, and I do not understand that the vice-chancellor would have held that, if the words had been the same as they are here, the same result would have ensued.—p. 282.

Rankin v. Horner (1812) 16 East 191.

ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. (for the Court).—In Walker v. Burrell, Lord Mansfield certainly is reported to have said that "he thought that as the plaintiffs had proved a debt under the commission, they could not question its validity, though they might at the time of the act of bankruptcy;" or, according to 3 T. R. 322, "proving a debt under the second commission estopped them from litigating the regularity of the proceedings under it." But the jury found for the plaintiff against whom this evidence was to have operated, and the Court refused to grant a new trial: so that the point did not ultimately become material. This dictum, however, goes beyond what it is now contended for; for, after proving a debt, the plaintiffs could not have questioned the validity of the commission, the proof would have been, not merely prima facie but conclusive evidence; and as the other judges did not notice the point; as it does not appear to have been discussed, as it was not decided; as no instance appears in which it has since been acted upon; and as, upon the grounds already stated, it would be unreasonable to bind the creditor by such proof, and it is difficult to see how he could resist it, if it were admitted as prima facie evidence; we are of opinion that the proof in this case ought to have been received, as proof of the validity of the commission.—p. 193.

BRETT, M.R.—Entering into rash and hazardous speculations was wrong conduct before the passing of this Act [of 1883]. The Act is not manufacturing a new wrong thing; it is only taking notice in a new way of that which was always known to be wrong. In order to limit the section to conduct which has taken place since the passing of the Act, there ought to be in it the words "since the passing of the Act," and there are no such words. If the matter stood upon the statute alone, I should say that there was no reason why the Court should not take into consideration the facts referred to in sub-sect. 3, even if they happened before the passing of the Act, when the bankrupt is applying for a discharge after the commencement of the Act. I am inclined to think that those things might be taken into consideration, even if the adjudication had been made before the passing of the Act. But it is said that In re White is an authority to the contrary. There, however, the question arose upon sect. 159 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, which was a peculiar section. By it certain acts were treated as crimes, and the Court was empowered to sentence a bankrupt who had committed them to imprisonment. It was not imprisonment merely for the purpose of enforcing a remedy, but imprisonment as a punishment, and then there was a proviso at the end of the section that no person should be liable by virtue of the Act to any criminal proceeding or penalty in respect of any matter which might have occurred before the passing of the Act, i.e., liable to the imprisonment to which he might have been sentenced under sect. 159. It appears from the reports of the case that Lord Westbury rested his decision on the fact that sect. 159 gave a criminal character to the acts in question. The reports have unfortunately omitted to state that counsel called the attention of the Court to the proviso, but they must have done so. There is no such proviso in sect. 28 of the present Act, and the things referred to in sub-sect. 3 are not treated as criminal acts. They are not in their nature criminal, though they are very wrong things for a trader to do. But there are some other cases contrary to the decision of Lord Westbury. In one of them, Ex parte Dornford (4 De G. & Sm. 29), Knight Bruce, V.-C., held that the conduct of a bankrupt as a trader before the Bankruptcy Act of 1849 came into operation might be taken into account with reference to the provisions of that Act as to the allowance of his certificate. And in Ex parte Storer (2 D. M. & G. 263), Knight Bruce and Lord Cranworth, L.JJ., came to the same conclusion. Knight Bruce, L.J., said: "It has been suggested by Mr. Cooke that, even if the case set up by the opposing creditors were made out, it does not fall within sect. 256 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1849, because the particular facts occurred before the statute. For this no decision was cited; and, considering the learning and experience of Mr. Cooke, I think I may take it that none exists; and I state my opinion to be that, if this case comes otherwise within the Act of Parliament, it is not the less so, because the conduct complained of took place before the passing of the statute." Every word of that is applicable to the present case. The judgment of Lord Westbury in In re White is not consistent with it, for it related to a section which was not like sect. 28. That section resembles sect. 256 of the Act of 1849. We do not attempt to overrule Lord Westbury's decision, but we act on our own construction of sect. 28, and upon the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Storer.—p. 943.

BLACKBURN, J.—In Lyde v. Mynn, A. granted an annuity to B., and covenanted that if his wife left him any property he would charge it with the annuity. The annuity became discharged by A.'s bankruptcy, and the wife afterwards died, leaving him property. Shadwell, V.-C., and Lord Brougham, C., thought the covenant was a security which was not discharged by the bankruptcy; and though it was argued (and I think there is a good deal in the argument) that the debt being discharged the covenant to secure it was also gone, this argument was overruled. It is sufficient to say that the precise point does not arise in the present case, as there is no covenant to transfer, or anything amounting to an equitable mortgage like the case of Holroyd v. Marshall (10 H. L. C. 191; 32 L. J. Ch. 109).

SELBORNE, L.C.—The case of Jakeman v. Cook was referred to as showing that in a case, not of composition, but of liquidation by arrangement, after a debtor has obtained his discharge, he is at liberty to enter into a new contract with one of his creditors to pay him his original debt in full. That case appears to me to have no bearing whatever on the present case. The present case is that of a statutory composition under sect. 126, and the agreement of August, 1879, was made, not only before the statutory composition was exhausted by the fulfilment of its terms, but even before the first instalment of the composition had become due to the creditors who were bound by it. It may well be that after a composition has been fully and finally worked out, and all the instalments of it have been paid, the position of the debtor is the same as that of a debtor who has obtained his discharge in a bankruptcy or a liquidation by arrangement, and that an agreement by him with one of the creditors, such as that which was made in Jakeman v. Cook, may be supported. But in the present case everything was done before any of the instalments of the composition had become payable to any of the creditors.—p. 470.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The older cases are conclusive authorities that the costs, in such a case as the present, though not provable as a debt under the bankruptcy, are barred by the certificate as incident to the original debt which is barred. These cases were not brought to the notice of the Court in Maughan v. Vinesberg, which case appears not to have been much considered nor fully argued. We have, therefore, to choose between that and the older cases; and as they cannot be said to have been overruled we prefer to follow them and decline to be bound by the later case.—p. 261.

MELLOR, J.—I should feel myself bound by Harris v. James did I not think we were relieved from that decision by the effect of subsequent legislation, which all seems to point to a different date, viz., the time when the order or certificate takes effect; that is, to the time when it was granted, and not to any previous date by the artificial doctrine of relation to the commencement of the bankruptcy. Reading sect. 151 with the subsequent sections, it is clear that it is the order of discharge, and that alone, which is a bar to further proceedings; and "thereafter" must mean "after the order of discharge take effect;" there is here no ambiguity, and we are, therefore, relieved from the effect of the decision under 5 Geo. 2, c. 30, in Harris v. James, and are at liberty to construe the statute according to the plain meaning of the words.—p. 235.

BRETT, J.—It seems to me that the facts proved bring this case precisely within Troughton v. Gitley. It was suggested by the learned counsel for the plaintiff that that case had been overruled or was wrongly decided; and expressions of Lord Eldon in subsequent cases were referred to intimating his disapproval of it—amongst others Ex parte Martin (15 Ves. 115). Be that as it may, Mr. Willis has satisfied us that no Court of equity has overruled Troughton v. Gitley, but that, on the contrary, it has been repeatedly affirmed. Lord Eldon himself, in Ex parte Bourne (2 Glyn & J. 137, at p. 141), seems to have accepted the doctrine of Troughton v. Gitley as an equitable doctrine then in force. So, in Ex parte Butler (2 M. D. & D. 731, 741) Sir John Cross, sitting in the Court of Bankruptcy, affirmed the doctrine of Troughton v. Gitley. And further, there is the exceedingly strong authority of the Lords Justices Turner and Knight Bruce in Tucker v. Hernaman (4 De G. M. & G. 395; 22 L. J. Ch. 79) in favour of Troughton v. Gitley as an existing equitable doctrine.—p. 653.

JESSEL, M.R.—If the appellant is to succeed at all he must succeed either on the general equitable doctrine, of which Troughton v. Gitley is only an example, that a man cannot stand by having a charge or incumbrance upon property and allow another to advance money on it on the supposition that it is unincumbered. That assumes that he has knowledge that the other man is going to advance money, and suppresses the fact of his own interest. So the owner of land may not stand by and allow another person to lay out money in building on it, as if it was his own land. But there again you must show that he knew that the other person was laying out the money under the false belief that the land was his own. In my opinion Lord Hatherley

[then Page-Wood, V.-C.] did not intend to lay down any other doctrine than this in his dictum in In re Rawbone's Trust. . . I therefore think that there is no law on this subject extending beyond the two rules I have alluded to [the general equitable doctrine and the bankruptcy doctrine of reputed ownership], and that if the dictum of Lord Hatherley was intended to add anything to them it has no foundation in authority, but is only an inaccurate reference to the decision in Troughton v. Gitley.—p. 528.

LUSH, L.J.—In the case of a sale of the estate to the debtor himself for a price, as in Ex parte Tinker, where the debtor agreed to pay by yearly instalments a certain sum which must have come out of his yearly earnings, the Court held that it would be a breach of faith to take his after-acquired property, because all parties must have understood that he was to pay the instalments out of his earnings. That is not this case. The sale here is a sale to a third person; it is immaterial that he was the trustee.

It is a sale to a third person, and a sale of that kind is authorised by the Bankruptcy Act.—p. 154.

SELBORNE, L.C.—With regard to the case of In re Bright's Settlement, far be it from me even to adopt upon this present occasion the language of the Master of the Rolls, who seems to have thrown some doubt upon that decision. It may have been a perfectly good decision, and, if it was, it seems to me to have depended upon the presence of special negative words in the statute of 1849 there construed, which prima facie as to the subject to which they are applied exclude the possibility of the bankrupt giving a title to anybody after his bankruptcy. Those negative words were the ground of the decision. I do not propose to enquire whether they were rightly construed or rightly applied.—p. 399.

ESHER, M.R.—The contract work went on and was completed [by the trustee in liquidation of the contractors] and the architect certified accordingly under the old contract, and, thereupon, if there had been no question of any assignment, the building owners would have been bound to pay the retention moneys over to the trustee. But there had been an equitable assignment of a portion of those moneys by the contractors before the liquidation, of which the building owners had notice; and in consequence they are bound to pay such portion of them to the assignees. It is argued that in holding that they are so bound we shall be contravening what was decided in Tooth v. Hallett. In that case there was the same power given to the building owner to take the work out of the hands of the contractor, but the vital difference between that case and the present is, as it seems to me, that there the building owner had acted on the power and taken the work out of the contractor's hands. Whether he had done so was a question of fact. It appears to me that the judgment of Selwyn, L.J., proceeds on the view that he had done so.

and Cotton, L.J., in the subsequent case of Brice v. Bannister (1878, supra) took the same view of the case of Tooth v. Hallett, viz., that the building owner there not only had the power to take, but actually had taken the work out of the original contractor's hands. That case therefore is no authority for the present, where we find that the building owners did not put an end to the doing of the work under the original contract and the trustee elected to go on under the contract. For these reasons I . . . think this appeal must be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The objection taken by the purchaser is a very formidable one if there is anything in it; and one cannot say that there is nothing in it, because the question has arisen already, and Stirling, J., in the case of In re Briggs and Spicer has held the objection to be so serious that he could not force a similar title on the purchaser. On the other hand, Vaughan Williams, J., who has had to consider the question from a somewhat different point of view, has come to the conclusion that the purchaser would get a good title [in In re Brall].

The question turns on the construction of sect. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. . . . Looking at the language only, it seems to me that, when an enactment says a settlement "shall be void against the trustee in bankruptcy," it does not mean that it shall be void before there is a trustee in bankruptcy.

Let us consider what the consequences would be if the other conclusion were arrived at. No conveyance or transfer of property which came within the definition of the settlement in this 47th section could ever be safely made by anybody if that conveyance or transfer was what is called "voluntary," that is to say, without consideration. . . . That cannot be the meaning of the section, and yet that would be the result if you construe the words "void against the trustee in bankruptcy" as meaning void from the date of the transaction which is referred to. To my mind, good sense is shocked by such a startling construction as that.

The construction which appears to me to be correct has been adopted not only by Vaughan Williams, J., but by the Court of Queen's Bench in In re Holden.

SELBORNE, L.C.—I will only add one word upon that class of cases which have been cited, and which appear to have been considered by the Master of the Rolls to be authorities for the decision at which his lordship arrived. They are undoubtedly cases in which an apparent exception is made to the general rule that where there is a bona fide trust, the trustee does not hold the property in his priver and disposition with the consent of the true owner, or with such a reputation of ownership as to cause the property to be treated as his own in case of bankruptcy. But the principle of the exceptions in those cases, which I will assume for the present purpose to have been correctly made upon the facts of those particular cases, is this, that there being no bona fide reason for the creation of any trust, the forms of a trust were gone through in order to conceal the true ownership of the property. That has been held to be in truth an abuse of the forms of a trust for the purpose of creating a reputation of ownership, and placing the property within the order and disposition of another with the consent of the true owner of the property. For the reasons which I have already given, that principle cannot apply where a joint-stock company is the true owner, and can have given no consent, and where the investment is an unauthorised investment of the money of the company as against the company by the act of its trustees.

SELBORNE, L.C.—The cases most directly in point, are, first of all, Knowles v. Horsfall, which has been evidently regarded with a certain degree of dissatisfaction by judges of later date. The learned judge who reported it expressed regret that he had done so, because it turned on the particular manner in which the facts were stated in the special case. There was a custom stated in the special case, but—perhaps intentionally and with a view of covering, not only the case of goods in the warehouse of the vendor, but also goods in the warehouse of a third party, which were left in the vendor's name without any notice to the warehouseman—the statement of the custom was left vague and general. It was not stated as a custom applicable to the business of the vendor considered as a person who kept a bonded warehouse himself, and there was no statement to the effect of the evidence in this case, as to the particular course of the business of wine and spirit merchants having bonded warehouses of their own. It may be said that the custom was stated so generally that it might have been inferred that it would extend to those cases, but it was not stated specifically with reference to them, and that has been pointed out in subsequent cases, as in Watson v. Pearce (1 Bing. (N.C.) 327), where it was stated that no usage was proved in Knowles v. Horsfall, Thackerait v. Cook (3 Taunt. 487) is not only not an authority for the respondents here, but just the reverse, as it appears to me. The actual usage proved there was a usage the purpose and intention of which was to continue reputation of ownership in the vendor. It is not wonderful that, under those circumstances, it was held that the reputation of ownership did continue. What was said by Sir James Mansfield shows, as I understand him, that on such evidence of custom, as we have here, he would have held the reputation of ownership to have been displaced. I am unable to distinguish the present case from Hamilton v. Bell and Priestley v. Pratt, unless there be a difference between the principles to be applied to wine on the one hand and clocks and watches on the other, which nobody can seriously suggest. There are other cases in which the Courts have shown a decided inclination to reduce within limits, more consistent with a sound and reasonable view of the doctrines, some of the dicta or views which are to be found in the earlier cases. I should not indeed like to commit myself to the strong language of Sir Frederick Pollock in the case of Prismall v. Lovegrove, in which he said that the old doctrine of reputed ownership was completely out of fashion, and had been so for at least forty years. It would be more in accordance with my opinion to say that the doctrine of reputed ownership has been the same from first to last, but that the Courts have of late years looked more narrowly and closely to the real value and weight of the circumstances which tend on the one hand to confirm, and on the other hand to exclude, the reputation of ownership.—p. 531.

MELLISH, L.J.—The principle laid down in Ex parte Watkins was, that in determining whether, when goods sold remain in the possession of the vendor up to the time of his bankruptcy, the vendor is the reputed owner of them, the Court must have regard to the custom of the particular trade, and if there was a well-established custom that goods when sold should remain in the possession of the vendor it prevents the mere fact of their continuing in his possession from giving the reputation of ownership. The real question in that case was whether it was enough to prove the existence of such a custom in a particular trade; and the Court of Appeal held, on the authority of several recent cases at common law, that it was enough to prove the custom of a particular trade, because the creditors of a trader are mostly persons engaged in the same trade, or bankers or other persons who are acquainted with the custom of that particular trade. That being so, does it make any difference that these goods were in another man's warehouse, and not in the vendor's warehouse, as was the case in Ex parte Watkins? As to the purchaser, it could make no difference. The evidence shows that the custom exists for the goods to remain in the name of the vendor at the bonded warehouse, but for them to be transferred in the vendor's own books. The purchaser buys them in bond and by the custom of the trade they may remain there for years, to avoid the payment of duty on them, in the possession of the vendor or of some person who holds them for him. The reputation of ownership is prevented from arising just as much when the goods are in another person's warehouse as in the vendor's. If the vendor's creditors know nothing about the goods, it can make no difference in what warehouse they are. If they know that the goods are in the vendor's name in the warehouse of a third person, they know that they are not necessarily for that reason the vendor's goods. I think, therefore, that the principle of Ex parte Watkins applies to this case.—p. 607.

JAMES, L.J.—This case seems to me to come exactly within the authorities cited. I have referred to the common law cases (Lingham v. Biggs, Lingard v. Messiter), where the bankrupt was the owner, and a change of ownership occurred which was not known to the world. The case of Ex parte Watkins was not intended in the slightest degree to weaken or overrule these cases, and the constant practice based upon those cases simply shows that the doctrine laid down in them may be countervailed by evidence of any known custom or practice in the particular trade in question, known to the dealers in that trade and known to the bankers and other persons accustomed to have dealings with persons in that trade. In Ex parte Watkins it was perfectly well known as the universal practice of the spirit trade that spirits should remain in the warehouse of the vendor, and in these circumstances it was held that no reputation of ownership arose as to the spirits in the warehouse. But that case would be no authority for determining this case unless it could be made out, which was not attempted to be done, that there is a practice known in London, or anywhere else, under which drapers, or persons who are the owners of furniture in the rooms of the house in which they live, ordinarily sell their furniture to a dealer, and then take it back again upon the terms of paying a weekly rent.—p. 625.

JAMES, L.J.—The same question arose in the case of Ex parte Powell, In re Matthews, some years ago. The chief judge took official notice that this was the custom of trade among hotel keepers. In the Court of Appeal we were of opinion that the custom was not so well established as that the Court ought to take judicial notice of it. But as the trustee declined to have an issue tried, the decision of the chief judge was affirmed. Since that time the custom has become much more widely known. Everybody knows that it is a very common practice indeed, especially for hotel keepers, to hire furniture; and if it is a common practice, it negatives the foundation of the rule in bankruptcy as to reputed ownership, which is to prevent a man obtaining false credit by the possession of the goods.—p. 496.

KELLY, C.B. (for the majority).—Still the question is, whether, looking to the decisions on the subject, and with still greater and more minute attention to the words of the section (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 125), we are called upon on this, the first occasion, so far as I know, in which this important question has been brought under the consideration of a Court of error, to hold that, as a general rule of law, a partnership in which there is a dormant partner is within the provisions of this enactment. Upon this point we have unquestionably what cannot be doubted to be the very high, if not the highest, authority of Lord Eldon in the case of Ex parte Dyster (2 Rose 256), in which it would seem that that learned judge was of opinion that a partnership in which there is a dormant partner is, in general, within the provisions similar to this section. The same appears undoubtedly to have been the opinion of some of the judges of the Queen's Bench, whose opinion and authority are entitled to great weight in the case of Ex parte Enderby. That, again, was followed by the case of Smith v. Watson. And it cannot be denied that judges of great learning, and the very highest eminence, have entertained and pronounced an opinion which is at variance with that which this Court is about to deliver.—p. 476.

JAMES, L.J.—We cannot look at the hardship inflicted upon any particular person, or at the nature of any particular transaction. We can only apply the fixed rule, that that which is joint estate shall go to the joint creditors, and that which is separate estate shall go to the separate creditors. And what is joint estate, and what is separate estate is also affected by the doctrine of reputed ownership. It is said that doctrine does not apply to a case of this kind. I am of opinion, however, that that doctrine was really the foundation of Lord Cranworth's judgment in In re Rowland and Crankshaw. I wish to make this further observation upon the case of Reynolds v. Woolf, which was decided in the Exchequer Chamber. Beyond all doubt, where property belongs to a partnership of two, and there is only one ostensible partner, you cannot apply the doctrine of reputed ownership. The property is that of the two, and you cannot say that, because there is only one ostensible partner, the Court will, in the event of bankruptcy, treat the property of the firm as in his order and disposition. The possession, in such a case, is quite consistent with the real title, and therefore the reputed ownership clause does not apply. But that has really nothing to do with a case where one man, who is the real owner, forms a partnership consisting of two or three persons and allows them to have the apparent possession and ownership of the property. There, the real owner being one person, some other persons, who are not the real owners, have acquired by his consent the reputed ownership and the apparent possession, and it can make no difference that he himself is one of the firm who have the apparent possession. Ex parte Arbonin was determined on reputed ownership, and that principle seems to me to underlie the decision in In re Rowland and Crankshaw. The ostensible partner received the goods, and the persons who dealt with the firm had a right to hold them to that which was represented by their common consent to be the fact. The doctrine of reputed ownership is only an application of the common principle that people must make good their representations; they must make good that which they hold out to the world as being the fact. That some of the creditors may be disappointed is beside the question, for a creditor has no equity except through his debtor. He has certainly no right to any particular assets, nor, indeed, has he any right with regard to the assets, except a right to have them dealt with according to the rights of the debtor in them. In Ex parte Sheen I was endeavouring to apply the principle of In re Rowland and Crankshaw, when I said that it would not do to show that some one creditor, or two or three creditors, might have received information that a man was liable as a partner, but that it must be shown that there had been an ostensible partnership held out to the world.—p. 22.

v. WILLIAMS, J.—The facts of the case do not bring it within Gomersall, In re. The ground of that decision was that the bills were drawn and accepted on the eve of bankruptcy, and were, in fact—to use the words of Lord Justice James—"mere shams and fictitious things," drawn and accepted for the express purpose of enabling a proof, and to which the Court found there was no intention that any efficacy should be given except in the event of bankruptcy, in which case it was intended that there should be a proof. In the present case I do not find any facts which would justify me in coming to the conclusion that there never was any intention that Captain Aylmer should pay these amounts.—p. 474.

GROSE, J.—As to the cases of Brooks v. Rogers and Howis v. Wiggins, this case has been reserved for the purpose of reconsidering them. The gentlemen in the Court of Chancery conceived that those decisions are directly in opposition to their daily practice. And of the case of Brooks v. Rogers it is remarkable that the Lord Chancellor, who in 1791 determined the case as chief justice of C. P., so doubted of it, that upon reconsidering it in the case Ex parte Seddon, in November, 1796, he overruled it, and permitted the debt to be proved. The case of Howis v. Wiggins came on before this Court upon a motion for a new trial: and possibly under a misapprehension of it, I considered it as a case of indemnity; and the ground on which the rule was refused was on a supposition that Vanderheyden v. De Pabre (3 Wilson 13), which was a case of indemnity, was in point. I then considered Howis, the plaintiff, and payer of the two promissory notes, as having indorsed them as a surety for the defendant, with a view to give credit to the notes, and without any consideration given to him for so doing. In any other way of considering that case I think it is not to be supported.—p. 577.

MELLISH, L.J.—In my opinion the rule in Ex parte Walker only applies where there are cross accommodation acceptances, or, at any rate, only applies where the acceptances are given by the one party in consideration of the acceptances given by the other party. In that state of things, in taking the account, the acceptances and bills on both sides are to be rejected, and I do not think that any of the authorities which have been cited establish the principle that, where a debt has been paid by giving an acceptance, and the creditor has discounted the bill, and it remains outstanding, although no action at law could be maintained for it, yet, nevertheless, if the acceptor becomes bankrupt, there could be a proof. In my opinion, to admit that would be, as the chief judge has said, to admit a double proof.—p. 539.

MELLISH, L.J.—I cannot see how the doctrine of Ex parte Walker (4 Ves. 373) can possibly apply to a case where there are in fact three firms, and where the firm which seeks to prove is not the same as that which made the arrangement about the exchange of acceptances, if there was an exchange of acceptances. Indeed, I doubt whether I was right in what I said in Ex parte Macredie, that possibly the doctrine of Ex parte Walker might apply, not only to a case where there was an exchange of accommodation acceptances, but might apply to a case where one bill was in some respects the consideration for another bill. I have great doubt on further consideration whether that was right, and whether the rule was not that which was stated by Lord Selborne in that case, namely, that proof could only be admitted when an action at law would lie, and not in a case of pure accommodation acceptances in respect of which, if there was no bankruptcy, no action at law would lie.—p. 689.

But it does not appear that the words of the statutes were particularly presented to his judgment at the time. BAGGALLAY, J.A.—I was for some time unable to see how In re Simpson could be reconciled with the former authorities, but a more matured consideration of the facts and the authorities leads me to a conclusion that it can, because the facts of In re Simpson were very special. The chief judge, in giving his judgment in that case, pointed out the distinction between it and Ex parte Morley. It is unnecessary to go through his reasons, which clearly and distinctly show the difference between the two cases, and it appears to me that the principles of Ex parte

This makes the distinction between the present case and the case of *Dutton v. This rule is now so well established that it is useless to refer particularly to the cases illustrating it, and it is proposed, therefore, to notice at once the exceptions to the rule"—in a note upon that passage, he says, "As to co-debtors not partners, see Ex parte Field, Ex parte Buckingham, 1 M. JAMES, L.J.—Ex parte Carter is a very high authority, and has never, I believe, been questioned in this Court. That also was a case of executors of a partner who was dead, and "it was put upon exactly the same footing. It was said they cannot claim because there are still debts due from the estate. The executors cannot claim in competition with their own creditors." Attempts have been made to show that there were a number of peculiarities in that case of Ex parte Carter, that the estate had not all been wound up, and that trading had been going on, but really that had nothing whatever to do with the ratio decidendi of the case. The mere fact that accounts had not been taken to ascertain the amount of the debt, did not alter the character of the relation between the executors and the creditors. That was not a matter with which the creditors had anything to do. It was simply this. The amount of the debt was capable of being ascertained, though it was not ascertained. The sole ground on which they could not prove was this, that they could not prove in competition with persons who had a right to make them pay any debts. They were both going against the same estate. That being the principle adopted in Ex parte Carter, and acted upon in a very strong case indeed, in the case of Ex parte Bess, In re Motion (38 L. J. Bk. 39), and recognised again in the clearest terms by that case of Ex parte Collinge (12 W. R. 30; 4 De G. J. & S. 583), we should be unsettling the law of this Court if we were to affirm the judgment of the chief judge in this case. The chief judge seems to have been of opinion that we had given a decision in the case of Ex parte Westcott, In re White, which in some way or other conflicts with the authorities to which I have referred. But in that case we were simply dealing with a plain case of a claim by a cestui que trust against a trustee who had committed a breach of trust. There was a case there which did not appear to us to be within the words or the spirit of the rule. The cestui que trust said, "You have taken my money and spent it, I call upon you to pay it." We merely said that he was entitled so to call upon the trustee, and that was the simple ground of that case. It did not appear to me at that time that it could by any refined argument be brought within the application of Ex parte Carter. That was the simple ground there, and it was never intended to interfere with the rule which has been laid down.—p. 123.

CATRINE, L.C.—The statement of the general principle may be taken from a number of cases; but I may conveniently refer to the enunciation of it by Lord Eldon in the case of Ex parte Sillitoe:—"A partner in a firm, against which a commission of bankruptcy issues, shall not prove in competition with the creditors of the firm who are in fact his own creditors, and shall not take part of the fund to the prejudice of those who are not only creditors of the partnership, but of himself."

JAMES, BRETT and COTTON, L.J.J.

BRETT, L.J.—Can a process by a plaintiff which has effect on property or a debt only for a particular purpose, namely, to compel appearance, but which can only take effect on that property or debt so as to obtain the realisation of the debt due to the plaintiff out of that property or debt in one particular state of circumstances, be called a charge on that property or debt within the meaning of sects. 12 and 16 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869? In my opinion it cannot; and a process can only be called a charge or security if it can be enforced against the property under all circumstances, and not if it can be enforced in one particular state of circumstances only. For this reason, I am of opinion that the Court must give judgment in favour of the appellant, and in accordance with the decisions of Mr. Justice Lush in Richter v. Laxton, and Lord Romilly in Redhead v. Welton, and against the opinion of V.-C. Hall in Re London Cotton Mills Co.—p. 241.

ESHER, M.R.—Where there appears to be a fair and reasonable dispute between the parties, I do not think security for costs ought to be ordered. That is, I think, what Mr. Justice Cave intended to decide in In re Vanderhaege, Ex parte Izard, viz., that on an appeal by a creditor from the decision of the trustee's rejecting his proof, the Court has jurisdiction, in the exercise of its discretion, to order security for costs to be given, but that security should only be ordered in extreme cases.

LORD BROUGHAM (for J. C.).—In Olive v. Smith, a broker had been allowed to set off a debt antecedently due from his employer against the losses recovered from the underwriters on policies deposited in his hands. In Rose v. Hart, the Court held that such a set-off is only competent to the pawnee in cases where the thing alleged to be a giving of credit either constitutes a present cross-debt or must end in one. This limitation of the case of Olive v. Smith has, in subsequent cases, been approved and followed: Sampson v. Burton (2 Bro. & B. 89); Rose v. Sims (1 B. & Ad. 521).—p. 168.

BOVILL, C.J.—Rose v. Hart is a binding authority, and has not been overruled. Itself it overruled some previous cases, and was decided after consultation with many of the judges. The language of the judgment was evidently much considered. Mr. Williams has strongly urged that the case of Young v. Bank of Bengal is opposed to Rose v. Hart, and is a decision in his favour. Lord Brougham, however, in giving judgment in that case, says: "There is nothing inconsistent with what has now been advanced in the decision, in the language used by the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Rose v. Hart, where the former case of Oliver v. Smith was reconsidered, and a material qualification added to the generality of the doctrine which had been there laid down." His lordship does not propose to distinguish the two cases, but says, in effect, that the law which the Privy Council is there laying down is not distinguishable from the law already laid down in this Court.—p. 449.

COTTON, L.J.—Only two cases were much pressed upon us by Mr. De Gex. Bailey v. Johnson was a case where a bankruptcy had been annulled, and a set-off was allowed as between money which had been paid in by the trustee before the bankruptcy was annulled and money due to the bankers by the person who had been adjudicated a bankrupt. But that case was decided (certainly by the Exchequer Chamber) on the ground that, by virtue of sect. 81 of the Bankruptcy Act, on the annulling of the bankruptcy, the property reverted to the person who had been declared bankrupt, and became his as and from the time when it was paid into the bank, and therefore it was a clear case of set-off.

As to Bailey v. Finch, I think it is unnecessary to express any opinion whether the Court, in dealing with the matter then before them, correctly applied equitable principles to the circumstances of the case. What they did decide was this. They had to deal with a legal right of set-off, because both the accounts were the accounts of one person, and at law there was a right of set-off. But it was attempted to preclude that right by the fact that one of the accounts had been opened in the name of the customer as executor. There was a legal right to set-off, and the question was, whether there was a sufficient equitable ground for preventing the legal right from taking effect. And, as I understand it, the principle of the decision (whether right or wrong) was this—not that the fund was a trust fund from the nature of the account, or that the bankers had notice of that, but that they had notice that it was an account against which claims were likely to be made, and that if the claim had, at the time of the bankruptcy, been made against it, they would have prevented the legal right of set-off from arising; but that, as it was not shown there were any equitable claims against the fund, the legal right of set-off could not be interfered with. That was the ratio decidendi, as I understand it.—p. 501.

STIRLING, J.—In argument on their (the mortgagees') behalf reliance was placed on Talbot, In re, King v. Chick, decided by North, J., in 1888. Unfortunately in that case Savin, In re (42 L. J. Bk. 14; L. R. 7 Ch. 760) was not cited; and I am authorised by the learned judge to say that if his attention had been called to that decision of the C. A., his own would have been different. I am of opinion, therefore, that the proceeds of sale are not applicable to payment of interest accrued subsequently to the commencement of the winding up. As regards the application of the income, I confess that if the matter were res integra I should have had some difficulty in holding that there was any difference between that and the proceeds of sale; but it appears to me that I am bound by the decisions in Ransbottom, Ex parte (4 L. J. Bk. 33; 2 Mont. & Ayr. 79), and Penfold, Ex parte. Both cases were cited in Savin, In re, and no doubt was cast upon them. I have made a careful search and cannot find that the rule there laid down has ever been overruled. I have ascertained, by communication with the learned senior registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy, that these cases are still treated as authorities. . . . It seems to me, therefore, that I must treat Penfold, Ex parte, as containing the rule of the Court of Bankruptcy on the subject, and that Quartermaine's executors must be admitted to proof on terms similar to those contained in the order in that case.—p. 278.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am glad that my first impression of the law in this case has been corrected. No doubt the foundation of my opinion was that I treated the legislature as having made the act of bankruptcy itself void, unless there was something in the Act to the contrary. I considered that I could not decide otherwise consistently with Baron Martin's opinion as to the effect of the 87th section in Slater v. Pinder, and it did not occur to me to question the rule laid down by that eminent judge, which had, as I believed, been received with satisfaction by the profession. As, however, a more careful consideration of the Act has satisfied the other members of the Court that the fact of an execution being made an act of bankruptcy does not necessarily make it void, it follows that the execution creditor is entitled, in this case to have the benefit of his execution.—p. 446.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—By that section [sect. 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883] an execution creditor is not entitled to the benefit of his execution unless he has completed it by seizure and sale before notice of the commission of any available act of bankruptcy by the debtor. The mere fact that the execution and sale is itself an act of bankruptcy does not deprive the execution creditor of his rights of the fruits of his diligence. That is decided by Ex parte Villars. But the present case is clearly distinguishable from Ex parte Villars. In such a case as Ex parte Villars the act of bankruptcy is not committed until immediately after the completion of the transaction on which it is founded. Here there was no sale; but the execution was completed by the sheriff being paid out on 19th

October, and on the preceding 17th the execution creditor had already notice of an act of bankruptcy by the debtor.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It was said that the decision of Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams in Figg v. Moore was erroneous, and that therefore the trustee is not entitled. But I think that case was rightly decided, and for the reasons which the learned judge assigns; and I cannot think the Act can be construed otherwise than as he construed it.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—The decision in Parsons v. Lloyd is only stated by way of a note to the report of O'Brien v. Brodie (L. R. 1 Ex. 302); and in the principal case Baron Bramwell said that "the execution creditor certainly will, if he receives this money receive it by virtue of an execution. Our judgment must therefore be against him; but I do not understand this to be inconsistent with the case [Parsons v. Lloyd] decided by me at Chambers." The facts stated in the note are not sufficient to enable me to form a satisfactory opinion, but I think that the case was decided simply upon sect. 184 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1849.—p. 159.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—The first case is Ex parte Birmingham Gas Light Co., the circumstances of which were similar to those of the present case. In that case, immediately after a liquidation petition had been filed, an interim injunction was granted by a County Court, professing under the 13th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, restraining the company from further proceeding with a distress which they had levied on the property of the liquidating debtors, which was taken to be a leading proceeding on behalf of the company. Afterwards, the creditors having resolved upon a liquidation by arrangement, and appointed a trustee, the injunction was made perpetual. From that injunction an appeal was presented to Bacon, V.-C. The substantial question for him to consider was whether the distress was "an execution or legal process" within the meaning of the 13th section—whether there had been "proceedings in any action, suit, execution, or other legal process against the debtor in respect of any debt provable in bankruptcy." Having regard to the terms of the 155th section of the special Act of 1845, the V.-C. was of opinion that the power of distress which was thereby conferred on the company—a power to levy a distress of the same nature and of the same kind which a landlord was entitled to put in for arrears of rent—was not a legal process within the meaning of the 13th section of the Bankruptcy Act. No doubt he had regard to the terms of the 155th section, because, without that section, there would have been no right on the part of the gas company to recover the amount due to them for gas by distress. The 155th section gave them that power. The V.-C.'s attention does not seem to have been directed very prominently to the 157th section of the special Act, which limited the right of distress to the goods of the person liable to pay the debt, for I do not find that it is adverted to in his judgment, though it was referred to in the course of the argument. The other case is Ex parte Hill. That was a very different case. There the special Act did not give the company the same power to recover money due for gas as a landlord has to recover rent in arrear; but, as the headnote states it, "the special Act of a gas company empowered them to levy by distress all sums of money due to them for the supply of gas, the amount of which should not be disputed, and provided that any justice, on application, might inquire into and ascertain the amount due, and issue his warrant accordingly for levying the same." That is not the simple form of distress of which a landlord could take advantage; it is a special form of distress, and the Court held that "the company did not come within the words 'landlord or other person to whom any rent is due from the bankrupt' in sect. 34 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, but that the distress was a legal process against the estate of the debtor in respect of a provable debt, which the Court had under sect. 13 of the Act, or under rule 260 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1870, power to restrain." The distress was clearly a legal process against the estate of the debtor, and upon that ground I think the decision in Ex parte Hill (supra) is to be supported. I was a party to the judgment, and it does not, I think, in any way conflict with the judgment of Bacon, V.-C. in the other case. The distress, as it appears to me, was in the nature of a legal process for enforcing the payment of a debt due, and it came within the 13th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and not within the 34th. —p. 760.

Harrison, In re, Jay, Ex parte (1880), supra. COTTON, L.J.—In Brown v. Bateman, the principle of the decision was this, that the Court considered the effect of the contract was to give the landlord, from the very time when the contract was entered into, an equitable interest in the chattels, and therefore the case was not within the principle of Huginbotham v. Holme (19 Ves. 88). The decision of the chief judge in Ex parte Dickin seems to have proceeded on the same principle. His view of the facts, whether right or wrong, was this, that a lien on the chattels in question had been given to the landlords from the very commencement of the contract, and that, though a power was given to them to seize the chattels in the event of the bankruptcy of the builder, it was only given in consequence of the interest which had been previously vested in them; the present case cannot be brought within the principle of those cases. There is no stipulation that advances are to be made by the lessor to the builder, in respect of which she was to have a lien on the materials. We must, therefore, hold that the materials have become the property of the trustee.—p. 26.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think this is a novel decision, having regard to Ex parte Pillers, where it was held that a garnishee order was not a "dealing" with a bankrupt under sect. 94 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, because it was a step in invitum, and not in any fair sense of the word a "dealing with" him. In substance and in principle that decision covers the present case.

SIR JAMES HANNEN.—The settlement in question having been entered into in good faith on both sides, not with reference to the son's (the bankrupt's) creditors, but dictated by prudence as regards his children, is not to be set aside unless it comes clearly within the provisions of sect. 91 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. That depends on the meaning of the word "purchaser" in that section. It appears to me that what was said in In re, Pumphrey, Ex parte Hillman, had reference only to a case where the conveyance was purely voluntary, and without any consideration moving from or to any of the parties. Therefore all that was intended to be said in that case was that "purchaser" does not mean a purchaser in the limited conveyancing meaning of the word, but that in order to constitute a party a purchaser there must be a quid pro quo. This there was in the present case.—p. 405.

It is consistent with all of them except the case of *Hooking v. I ought, however, to add that what we have heard on the subject of striking a docket under the old bankruptcy law shows that that case is really not consistent with our present decision.—p. 89.

D. 248) words were used by James, L.J., and by the members of the Court, which point to the particular adjudication. James, L.J. says: "It must mean notice of an act of bankruptcy which would have been available for the making of the particular adjudication under which the proof is tendered." Now, judges, as well as other persons, sometimes use short expressions which, if expanded, would be perfectly clear, but which applied to a different set of circumstances in their non-expanded form are ambiguous. The lord justice was dealing there with this question—whether an act of bankruptcy committed twelve months before the actual adjudication would be an act of bankruptcy available for adjudication within the meaning of this section, and what he there, to my mind, clearly means, having regard to the point before him, is adjudication at the particular time when the adjudication was in fact made. It is adjudication at that particular date which was the only thing material, not the particular adjudication in the sense of an adjudication on the petition of the creditor who actually did get the adjudication. I think this is the reasonable interpretation of the language of James, L.J.—p. 611.

JESSEL, M.R.—In Ex parte Ladbury a special case was made out, though I do not know the exact extent of it. It appears from the report of that case in the Law Times, in which the facts are more fully stated than in the Law Reports, that the trustee had kept possession of the demised property, which was supposed to be of some value over and above an equitable mortgage upon it, that he had sold the equity of redemption, that the purchaser was unable to complete his contract and had forfeited part of his deposit in order to be let off his bargain, and the sum so forfeited had, of course, gone to increase the bankrupt's estate. It also appears that the landlord had been kept out of possession, how I do not know. Whether there was no proviso for re-entry, or any clause in the lease to hinder the re-entry, does not appear. That being so, it was held, not that the landlord was entitled to his rent up to the date of the disclaimer, but that he was entitled to some compensation for the trustee's use and occupation of the property during the time for which he was kept out of the estate, and in the opinion of the Court of Appeal the compensation which had been awarded him by the registrar was not too much. That is all which was decided in Ex parte Ladbury.—p. 391.

JESSEL, M.R.—Now, as I understand Ex parte Glegg, it decided two things. First of all, it decided that the thing to be got rid of by the disclaimer is the entire lease, and not a part of it, by which I mean all that is comprised in the lease. In that case it was not a question of property, but a question of proviso or covenant, and we held that the whole lease including the proviso was gone. A second point was no doubt decided there, though it appears in the report as if it was decided by me alone, but what I said was with the concurrence of the other members of the Court. That is, that though there are no words in the Act expressing it, and though all the Act says is that the lease is to be deemed to have been surrendered at the date of the adjudication, yet the Act intended to relieve the trustee from liability under the lease altogether, and that no interest in or liability under the lease should remain in him between the commencement of the bankruptcy and the date of the adjudication.—p. 344.

LUSH, L.J.—In Smalley v. Hardinge, the question of the effect of a disclaimer of a lease came before us in another form, and the point which has now been raised was not then present to our minds. There the trustee of a bankrupt had disclaimed a lease, and the lessor thought that he was entitled to get possession of the demised property, though the bankrupt had granted an underlease of it. Mr. Justice Mathew held that the lessor was entitled to eject the underlessee, and no doubt some expressions may be found in our judgments treating the disclaimer as having the same effect as an actual surrender of the lease. But the point which has now arisen was not then present to our minds at all. Now, however, that it has arisen, we shall still decide Smalley v. Hardinge, in the same way as we did then.—p. 758.

Snalley v. Harlings (supra), in C.A.
LUSH, L.J.—Here a legal term had been created out of the original lease, and that term had vested in the defendant. A surrender at common law is a voluntary act, and if the original lease had been surrendered in the ordinary manner, by the operation of a modern statute, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 9, the plaintiffs would have become entitled to a reversion expectant upon the defendant's lease. In Taylor v. Giltott only an agreement had been drawn up in favour of the underlessee. A disclaimer having been executed the original term was thereby surrendered. The intended lessee filed a bill in the Court of Chancery to compel the original lessor to execute a lease to him. I do not think the lessor could be compelled to carry out the contract of the lessee. No obligation existed upon the lessor, the estate of the lessee was entirely gone. I think that the Vice-Chancellor properly refused to stay the action of ejectment, and rightly dismissed the bill. The two cases are distinguishable.—p. 628.

PHILLIMORE, J.—This case is distinguishable from Harding v. Preece and Hill v. East and West India Dock Co. In those cases it was held that the disclaimer by the trustee in bankruptcy of the assignee of the lease did not destroy the original term. But in the present case the original lessee became bankrupt, and the effect of the disclaimer was to release the lessee, his property, and the trustee from liability to pay rent. As the defendant's guarantee only extended to the payment of rent in arrear, there is no liability under the guarantee for any rent after the date of the disclaimer.—p. 797.

CAVE, J.—In Ex parte Turquand, I expressed a doubt whether the words in sect. 55, sub-sect. 6 of the Bankruptcy Act. 1883] "person claiming an interest in any disclaimed property" include a landlord. They do of course include persons claiming under the bankruptcy, but, on further consideration, we think that they include the lessor also. For instance, if a lessee in possession who had neither given nor contracted to give any interest to any one else, were to become bankrupt, and his trustee were to disclaim, we think the Court would have authority under this section to give possession to the landlord on his application. . . . Where there is no person liable, either jointly with the bankrupt or alone, to perform the lessee's covenants, we are of opinion that, notwithstanding the doubt expressed in Ex parte Turquand, the landlord may apply that the sub-lessee may be put to his election.—pp. 347, 348.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—When I decided In re Lamb, I thought that I ought to perform the same sort of duty which the Board of Trade in the first instance has to perform, that is, to decide whether in any particular case the Board of Trade ought to object to the appointment of the trustee. In other words, to decide whether, having regard to all the facts of the case, it is antagonistic to the impartial performance of his duties or the interests of the creditors to appoint a particular person trustee because of his knowledge of the affairs of the bankrupt. I still think that it would have been for the advantage of the creditors if the law had been as I supposed, and if I had a right to exercise that discretion which I then attempted to exercise. But the Court of Appeal have held otherwise, and, therefore, I content myself with deciding that the objection is valid on the ground that I have stated, namely, that the trustee will, upon the examination of the accounts, have to act in a matter in which he is personally interested.—p. 145.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—... This case cannot be brought within the principle of In re Clay & Sons. I say again, as I said then, that the mere fact a man in business, when insolvent, meets a bill of exchange raises no inference of an intention or view to prefer the holder of the bill, because in the ordinary course of business a man must either meet his bills or put up his shutters. But the reason why In re Clay & Sons does not apply here is because the acceptance was not paid in due course. It was not presented at maturity, but afterwards and by express request. The result is, that this was a voluntary payment, and not a payment in ordinary course.

WRIGHT, J.—The only difficulty is as to Paine, In re, Read, Ex parte, and I agree with Caine for the appellant that prima facie the Court there appears to have held that the payment off by the bankrupt of the creditor was to be treated as a payment to or for the benefit of the acceptor of the accommodation bill drawn by the bankrupt. I think, however, that the money was there paid in substance to enable the acceptor to take up the bill. At variance with that view we have, however, the judgment of the C. A., in Mills, In re, Official Receiver, Ex parte, and those judgments, though based on the decision in Goldsmid, In re, Taylor, Ex parte, nevertheless contain dicta which we cannot overlook. The lords justices there seem to take the view that to constitute a fraudulent preference, the payment must be made to the person intended to be preferred.—p. 426.

LINDLEY, L. J.—It appears to me that an income of this nature [of a surgeon] cannot be impounded under sect. 90. In Ex parte Huggins the income of the bankrupt was a pension payable by a Colonial Government, and was analogous to the pensions which are referred to in sect. 89. That affords an illustration of the kind of case which sect. 90 was intended to meet. No other case of importance has been referred to except Emden v. Carte, which does not really touch the present point. That case only decided that the trustee of a bankrupt could insist on suing for damages for the breach after the bankruptcy of a contract which had been entered into with the bankrupt before the bankruptcy.

LINDLEY, M.R.—Benwell, Ex parte, Hutton, In re does not conflict with other cases. That case turned entirely on sect. 53, and is only an authority for the proposition that a prospective order cannot be made impounding the future personal earnings of a bankrupt. Similar observations apply to Shine, In re. Those cases are no authority for the proposition that property of a bankrupt acquired by his personal exertion since his bankruptcy, and not wanted for his present support, do not belong to his trustee. No such doctrine can be maintained in face of sect. 44. After bankruptcy, and before his discharge, whatever property a bankrupt acquires belongs to his trustees, save only what is necessary for his support.—p. 23.

LINDLEY, M.R. (for the Court).—According to the report in 4 Douglas, Lord Mansfield said: "The single question is, whether the assignees are entitled to the earnings of a bankrupt, and we are all clearly of opinion that they are not."

According to the report in Cooke's Bankrupt Laws, Lord Mansfield said, "The only question is whether the assignees of a bankrupt are entitled to the profits arising from his personal labour. The assignees cannot let out the bankrupt; they cannot contract for his labour." Attempts have been made to establish on the foundation of these statements the doctrine that whatever a bankrupt earns by his personal labour or ability after the bankruptcy belongs to him.

Chippendall v. Tomlinson is not an authority for any such proposition, and according to a note in the report in 4 Douglas, both Mr. Justice Buller and Lord Mansfield stated that if a bankrupt acquired a large sum of money or considerable effects they would undoubtedly belong to his assignees. So also said Lord Alvanley in Hesse v. Stevenson (1803) 3 Bos. & P. 565). . . . It may be that a bankrupt's trustee cannot maintain an action for money earned by the bankrupt since his bankruptcy by his personal exertions, if such money is required by him for his support and maintenance—see Williams v. Chambers ((1847) 16 L. J. Q. B. 280; 10 Q. B. 387), the pleadings in which, however, alleged promises to pay to the assignees for work done by the bankrupt.

The Bankruptcy Act of 1883, like its predecessors, excepts a bankrupt's tools and contemplates the acquisition of future property by a bankrupt, and he must live to use his tools and acquire such property. The present Act, like previous Bankruptcy Acts, must be construed so as to enable him to do so, and the language of sect. 44, clear and express as it is, must not, therefore, be taken so literally as to deprive the bankrupt of those fruits of his personal exertions which are necessary to enable him to live. But, on the other hand, the necessity is the limit of the exception. This is in entire accordance with modern decisions: Mercoer v. Vans Colina, Graydon, In re, Wadding v. Oliphant, Ewden v. Curte, and Rogers, In re Collins, Ex parte.—p. 22.

DAVEY, L.J.—In my opinion the case as between trustees in two successive bankruptcies is decided by Ex parte Ford; and I agree with the other members of the Court that there is nothing to distinguish that case from this. . . . All that Cohen v. Mitchell says is that, as between the bankrupt and any person dealing with him for value, the transaction is valid, and that that rule is only in favour of persons who have so dealt. But the persons who are claiming this property before us are not claiming it under the deed of assignment, but as property that vests in the trustee in the second bankruptcy.

Reg. v. Beck (1889) 16 Cox C. C. 718; 61 L. T. 596; 54 J. P. 360.—C.C.R.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—We have been pressed with the authority of the case of Re Burden, Ex parte Wood, upon the 13th, 14th, and 15th sub-sections of sect. 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869, in which my learned brothers Cave and Smith—because Parliament had used different language from the language used in those sub-sections, each of which relates solely to offences committed within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against the bankrupt, whereas the words substituted by sect. 163 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, are “if after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him”—came to the conclusion that Parliament had not used words affecting those sub-sections, and, therefore, held that those sub-sections were not to be read as if they were affected by the later Act. Now, why, because the Act of Parliament had not affected certain sub-sections which it does not profess to affect, we should hold that it does not affect another sub-section [9] which it does profess to affect, I am unable to see.—p. 721.

Walters*, must be considered as an authority in the defendant's favour. On examination, however, of the subject, it appears to me that what was there said is not law, and that the true construction of the 38th section is this—that if a bankrupt has so concealed his goods as to offend against the 32nd section, then his certificate is void under the 38th.

JAMES, L.J.—The cases in which the Court of Bankruptcy has decided that it ought not to assume jurisdiction are cases where it was asked to draw within its jurisdiction a person outside, merely because his opponent had become a bankrupt. Where, however, the proceeding is not in personam, but a person who has a claim against the property of the bankrupt, real or personal, is willing to submit the determination of his rights to the Court of Bankruptcy, it is very wrong, very reprehensible for the trustee to raise objections to the exercise of jurisdiction by that Court under whose care the property of the bankrupt is placed, and by which it is being administered (p. 884). What Lord Hatherley said in White v. Simmons was only one of the reasons which he gave for his decision, the decision being that the Court of Chancery had concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Bankruptcy to realise the security of an equitable mortgagee of a bankrupt, a matter about which there could be no doubt.—p. 885.

JAMES, L.J.—I do not wish in any way to withdraw from or qualify what has been said in the cases which have been referred to, viz., that cases which involve bankruptcy law, which involve the peculiar and paramount right of the trustee in a bankruptcy as distinct from the right which he takes as representing the bankrupt, are, ordinarily speaking, fit and proper to be tried in the Court of Bankruptcy. But it was not intended to decide that in cases of that kind the Court should never be able to exercise its judicial discretion not to assume the trial of the case. They merely laid down a general rule.—p. 17.

One of them is Ex parte Anderson, in which some pictures had been transferred by the debtor to his nephew, but that nephew had come in and made certain arrangements as to those pictures with creditors of the bankrupt, and, therefore, the matter was prima facie brought by his own submission and his own acts under the administration in bankruptcy.—p. 86.

JAMES, L.J.—In Ex parte Jerningham we were of opinion that the description given by the debtor was really misleading, because he did not give his private residence, so that his private creditors would not know anything about him. But here the chief judge was of opinion that no such case was made out. No one could really have been misled by the fact that this debtor called himself a cattle dealer, which was a business that he actually carried on. He was a farmer really, but no one seems to have been misled. The appellant was not misled; he knew very well what the man was, and no one else was misled. I am as certain as I can be of anything that no human being could have been misled by the description of "cattle dealer," because every one knows that it is one of the commonest things in the world for a farmer to be a cattle dealer also.—p. 729.

JAMES, L.J.—I wish to add that, in Ex parte Ditton, the question whether a creditor was entitled to appeal was not really argued. We stopped Mr. Winslow, who appeared for the trustee, on that point, and we only heard him on the question whether the appellant should be allowed a further opportunity of proving his alleged debt. All that we decided was, that a person who alleged himself to be a creditor, but who had not tendered any proof of debt, could not appeal.—p. 467.

BRETT, M.R.—This case, therefore, is not within rule 295; the appellant was not entitled to prove his debt at that time, and the registrar could not receive his proof, and he was not, within the meaning of the rule 295, a creditor who could be heard in opposition to the registration. I think this is what Bacon, C.J., meant to decide in Ex parte Kirkwood. He considered that the appellant Kirkwood had no locus standi, that he was not a creditor who could object to the registration of resolutions, because he had withdrawn his proof. I cannot say with the chief judge that "the rules are very clear and distinct." Though I agree with him that "the scheme is most carefully prepared and expressed in the rules." I think the chief judge intended to say that the appellant in that case could not give a proper notice to the registrar of his desire to be heard on the question of the registration of the resolutions, because he was not a creditor who had previously proved a debt. And I cannot help thinking that when James, L.J. said (11 Ch. D. 729): "It is not necessary for us to consider the second point, upon which, however, as at present advised, I am quite clear. It would require a great deal of argument to satisfy me that the chief judge was not right upon that point" (that is that the creditor had no locus standi, because he had not proved a debt)—

I cannot help thinking that James, L.J. meant that he had a clear opinion that the chief judge was right, because the creditor had not proved a debt, and could not prove it before the registrar on the hearing of the application to register the resolutions. We are told that this interpretation of Ex parte Kirkwood has ever since been acted upon by all the registrars in bankruptcy, and this fortifies me in my view that that was the intention of James, L.J. Though that expression of his opinion is not actually binding on the Court yet with the deference which I should always give to his opinion, I say that it is also my opinion.—p. 481.

It was not an appeal from an order of adjudication. There adjudication had taken place, and the bankrupt was contesting the proofs of the parties with whom he had been engaged in long and profitless litigation. CAVE, J.—The 112th rule [of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886] provides that where the bankrupt's assets do not exceed 300*l.*, a lower scale of costs shall be allowed "on all proceedings under the Act in which costs are payable out of the estate." Now, it seems to me that this is a case contemplated by that rule. . . . The fact that the Court has a discretion to disallow costs which otherwise would be payable out of the estate, does not, I think, prevent the application of the rule. The case of In re Dowson does not apply. There the trustee was ordered to pay the costs of other parties and to recoup himself out of the estate.

SELWYN, J.—With respect to the case of Ex parte Moss, we are informed by the registrar in Court, that the order, although not so stated in the report, was made by the registrar sitting for the commissioner.

As to the other case, Ex parte Barnett, the point was not brought to the attention of the Court: for if it had been, neither the Lord Chancellor nor I would have consented to hear the appeal; for I strongly entertain the same opinion as has been expressed by the Lord Chancellor, that we ought not to constitute this Court a Court of primary jurisdiction, and that we ought not, except under very special circumstances, to make orders without the advantage of a formal discussion and decision in an inferior Court.—p. 354.

BRETT, J.—If an issue has been properly directed upon a sufficient controversy of fact (as observed by Turner, J., in Morrison v. Barron (1 D. P. & J. 639)), and a jury has found upon it, and there has been a conflict of evidence upon it, and no leave has been reserved, neither the first Court, nor the Court of Appeal, can make an order or decree inconsistent with the findings of the jury, though satisfied that there was a misdirection which caused the miscarriage, or that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. The only remedy is a new trial. The reason is that in either case there is, after the verdict is set aside, still matter of controversy which another jury may not unreasonably find either way. This is decided by Fulton v.

Andrew (L. R. 7 H. L. 448), as well as by Fernie v. Young (L. R. 1 H. L. 68), and Simpson v. Holliday (L. R. 1 H. L. 315). I cannot but think that the case of Ex parte Norton is in conflict with the decisions of the House of Lords, and that it cannot be supported.—p. 97.

Cave, J., tells me that he merely meant to say that at the end of the witness's examination his answer must be accepted, that is, witnesses cannot be called to contradict him . . . with that explanation of Re Purvis, which I am authorised by Cave, J., to give, I entirely agree.—p. 521.

If, however, the report is correct, and I am driven to elect between the two cases, I should not hesitate to adopt the decision in Ex parte Wensley.—p. 172.

MR. COMMISSIONER BACON.—I should be very sorry to depart from the established practice of this Court, and I have the highest respect for the opinion of so learned and experienced a judge as Mr. Commissioner Holroyd. . . . But I have the statute before me, no rules exceeding its limits can be maintained. . . . I find by the 112th section that the bankrupt is entitled to his release unless it be shown that he has done certain things therein expressly named to disentitle him to it; here nothing has been shown against him.

BACON, C.J.—What I said in Ex parte Murray has been misunderstood. The law on this subject is plain. In Ex parte Murray the assets were enough to pay the debts twice over. The trustee's affidavit showed that a certain sum would be sufficient to pay the creditors in full. It would lead to almost uncontrolled abuses if I were to adopt the view which has now been pressed upon me, if the trustee's mere guess as to the value of the assets were to be necessarily adopted.

CAIRNS, L.C.—Their lordships observe that the case of Carter v. Dimmock, decided in the House of Lords, which was referred to in argument, does not appear to them to have any contrary bearing to the conclusion at which they have arrived. In that case it appeared that the bankrupt, having abstained from showing cause against the adjudication, although he was in the country and might have done so in the shorter time appointed by the English statute, afterwards applied to the commissioner in London within the twelve months, not upon any new materials, but simply for the purpose of disputing the propriety of the adjudication upon the materials upon which it was made, and against which he might have shown cause within the proper time. The House of Lords held that this was a course which was not open to him; and Lord Cranworth, in pronouncing the decision of the House of Lords, states expressly that it was only playing with words to treat that proceeding as anything but an appeal: that the second application to the commissioner, without any change of the materials upon which it was to be supported, was simply appealing to the commissioner from his own order, and upon the same materials; and that, on the proper construction of the English Act, the course which ought to have been taken was to make an application in such a case to the Court of Appeal, viz., the lords justices, and not to the commissioner. Those remarks have no relevancy to a case where the second application to a primary Court is made not on the same, but on different, materials.—p. 329.

LOREN, L.J.—Assuming that there were what is equivalent to a discharge in bankruptcy in France, of which I am very doubtful, I am of opinion that such discharge cannot operate as a discharge in respect of a contract made in England, though the defendants be domiciled in France. That proposition seems to me to be the result of the judgment of Lord Kenyon in Smith v. Buchanan and that of Lord Blackburn in Bartley v. Hodges.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—The authority first relied upon by Mr. Piffard was the dictum of Lord Westbury in Ex parte Cockburn, that, "as the deed is between the parties, no person who is not a party could sue upon the covenant." But that was not necessary to the decision of the case, and must be considered as overruled by the cases of Greasy v. Gibson (L. R. 1 Ex. 112) and Reeves v. Watts (L. R. 1 Q. B. 412).

McLaren v. Baxter (supra), approved.

The doctrine laid down in this case, "That a creditor has a right to have a deed presented to him for execution, which, when executed, will put no burthen on him to which he ought not to be subject," disapproved of by the Court of Exchequer Chamber.—p. 372.

HERSCHELL, L.C. (speaking of Jackman v. Mitchell).—It was obvious that the transaction in that case could not stand.

Whitmore v. Targuand (1861) 30 L. J. Ch. 345; 3 De G. F. & J. 107; 7 Jur. (N.S.) 377; 4 L. T. 38; 9 W. R. 488.—L.C.

CAMPBELL, L.C.—I think it unnecessary again to go over the long list of cases cited in the argument, and most minutely analysed and commented upon by the Vice-Chancellor. I content myself with saying that I concur with his remarks upon them, except the leading case of Dunch v. Kent, and of that I think the first view taken by his honour is the sounder one. I likewise place great reliance on his own previous decision in Nicholson v. Tuttle (2 Kay & J. 18).—p. 354.

Wood v. Dunn (1886) 7 B. & S. 94; 36 L. J. Q. B. 27; L. R. 2 Q. B. 78; 15 W. R. 180; 15 L. T. 411.—EX. CH.; reversing 35 L. J. Q. B. 11; L. R. 1 Q. B. 77; 12 Jur. (N.S.) 331; 13 L. T. 403; 14 W. R. 84.—Q.B., followed.

BRAMWELL, B.—Then it has been urged that to decide this case in favour of the respondent will be to overrule the decision of Lord Tentenden in Carter v. Warne. Now, even if the point in that case had been fully before Lord Tentenden in banc and he had decided it there as he has here ruled at Nisi Prius, I should not have hesitated to question such a decision; but it is not necessary to go so far as that here, for the opinion which he there expressed was so expressed in the inevitable haste of a trial at Nisi Prius, and on a point which was not before him; and when I see that the case has been doubted, and, shall I say, "blown upon," by the case of Haw v. Kennett (3 A. & E. 162; 4 L. J. K. B. 220), and the opinions of the learned judges who decided that case, then I think that I am not at all bound by Carter v. Warne, and that we may overrule it, as we now do.

BLACKBURN, J.—As to the cases, only one has any semblance of authority for the plaintiff (Ex parte Cleland), but it will be found to be plainly distinguishable. There an adjudication of bankruptcy against Cleland had been set aside, and it was ordered that he should be at liberty to enforce the order for costs against the petitioning creditor, if they remained unpaid, by execution. The debt due to the creditor from Cleland was larger than the amount of costs; but Cleland's attorney was unpaid, and had claimed a lien on the costs. Cairns, L.J., under these circumstances, held that the solicitor's lien must be respected, and that the debt ought not to be set off against the costs. No doubt there are expressions used by Cairns, L.J., which, to a certain extent, justify the reliance Mr. O'Malley put upon them; but all that they really amount to is, that the Court of Chancery would not, any more than a Court of law, interfere to allow a debt to be set off against an execution, except on the terms of the attorney's lien being discharged. It is, therefore, no authority for saying that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust exists between a judgment creditor and his attorney; and to do this would be to introduce great mischief, and would be to run counter to decided cases.—p. 505.

LORD WATSON (for J. C.).—Their lordships are willing to assume that the law of England, so far as it concerns the right of the bar of England to sue or make agreements for payment of their fees, was rightly applied in the case of Kennedy v. Brown; but they are not prepared to accept all the reasons which were assigned for that decision in the judgment of Erle, C.J. It appears to them that the decision may be supported by usage and the peculiar constitution of the English bar, without attempting to rest it upon general considerations of public policy. Even if these considerations were admitted, their lordships entertain serious doubts whether, in an English colony where the common law of England is in force, they could have any application to the case of a lawyer who is not a mere advocate or pleader, and who combines in his own person the various functions which are exercised by legal practitioners of every class in England, all of whom, the bar alone excepted, can recover their fees by an action at law.—p. 751.

RUSSELL, C.J.—First, it is said that the hearing . . . was not a hearing and determination of the summons so as to exhaust the application upon which it was granted, and that the case consequently comes within the principle of Reg. v. Lancashire JJ. It is said that all that took place on that occasion was that there was an intimation from the magistrates that they were not satisfied with the evidence given in support of the mother's claim, that they did not dismiss the summons upon the merits, and that if she could bring further evidence she might apply again. But, as regards her coming again it must be observed that that in no way depended upon the will of the magistrates. Within twelve months from the birth of the child she would have had the right to come again without their consent. Therefore, this intimation did not qualify their decision in any way; and, that being the case, I feel bound to hold that the summons was disposed of on the merits, and to give effect to the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Thomas, and also to the decision of the Exchequer Division in Staples v. Staples.—p. 513. MATHEW, J. concurred.

LUSH, J.—Reg. v. Glynne sets forth distinctly the principles applicable to a case of this description. There the Court of quarter sessions arrived at a decision on the merits. No case has been decided which speaks of the justices' decision at quarter sessions being final where not on the merits. An order quashed for any formal defect is not conclusive. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 10, s. 2. What is the meaning of the words, "on the merits"? They must mean on the evidence produced before the justices. Here the order was quashed because no evidence was forthcoming.—p. 68. MANISTY, J. agreed.

HUDDLESTON, B.—Our view of the law is supported by Southeran v. Scott, where, with one exception, this very point was practically decided by Field and Manisty, JJ. It is true that the case did not contain the element that the husband was able to maintain the bastard child, and it was suggested that had that element appeared, Field, J. would have been of a contrary opinion, but I have taken the opportunity of consulting my brother Field, and he has told me that he and Mr. Justice Manisty were of opinion that the competency of the husband ought to have no effect, and he also added that the passage in the Law Reports by which he is represented to have inclined to the other view was rather an observation which fell from him in deference to what had been said by Mr. Justice Lush in a previous case, and not because he agreed with him. The report in the Law Journal Reports, though in substance it is the same, is somewhat different, and does not represent Mr. Justice Field as speaking so positively on the point. . . . In the other case which was cited—Stacey v. Lintell—the question was, whether the order could be obtained by a married woman, and it is therefore not an authority in point. It is true that in giving judgment, Lush, J. threw out a suggestion that on the marriage of the mother the justices would have a discretion whether they would continue an order previously made on the putative father, but, with all respect to that learned judge, I do not see that the justices have any such discretion.—p. 107.

HUDDLESTON, B. and GROVE, J. disagreed, the latter holding that the Act (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65, s. 4) was not imperative as to enforcing payment, and that the opinion of Huddleston, B., in *Hardy v. ALDERSON, B.—With respect to the question whether this instrument is or is not a bill of exchange, the case of Reg. v. Hawkes is undoubtedly in point. I must own, however, that I now think I was wrong on that occasion. The case seems to have been decided on the ground that Gray v. Milner (3 Taunt. 739) governed it; and the fact was not adverted to that Gray v. Milner may be thus explained; that a bill of exchange made payable at a particular place or house is meant to be addressed to the person who resides at that place or house.—p. 415.

Bank of England v. Vagliano—in H.L. (infra). [Head note.—The respondent's clerk, by forging letters of advice, and preparing and filling in forged drafts, in which he inserted the name of a foreign correspondent of the respondent as being that of the drawer, and the names of a foreign firm, who were existing persons and actual correspondents of the respondent, as being the names of the payees, procured his employers' acceptance of those forged instruments, and obtained payment for them across the counter from the appellant bank. The clerk appropriated the moneys to his own use, which were thus lost to the bank:—Held (dissentientibus, LORDS BRAMWELL and FIELD) that the loss incurred on the forged bills must fall upon the respondent.] See judgments.

COCKBURN, C.J.—With the greatest respect for the high authority of the very learned judges who presided on the occasion, I must say that the decision of the Court in Trimbey v. Vignier surprises me. The opinions given by the two French advocates in that case seem to me to be perfectly reconcilable with each other. One of them, that of M. Blanchet, is positive that the 138th article of the Code de Commerce is only available on behalf of the party making the indorsement in blank against the immediate holder under such indorsement. I, therefore, do not feel myself bound by that case.—p. 475.

WILLES, J.—That case would seem to have been an application of the doctrine in Penny v. Jones (1 C. M. & R. 439; 4 L. J. Ex. 12), that a person who puts his name on the back of a bill may be treated as a new drawer; but that doctrine is inapplicable to notes, by reason of the Stamp Act.—p. 366.

Whitehead v. Walker (1842) 10 M. & W. 696; 12 L. J. Ex. 28; 7 Jur. 330.
PARKE, B.—The case of Burrough v. Moss (10 B. & C. 558) is good law, and has been recognised in this Court. Nor do I think that case is affected by the decision of Coleridge, J., in Goodall v. Ray. It seems to me that either there must be some inaccuracy in the report, or there must have been in that case that sort of formal notice to the plaintiff which is equivalent to an agreement to set off the cross demand as against him. On that ground the case may, perhaps, be supported, otherwise I cannot assent to the position that a mere notice of a set-off between the payee and the maker can operate to restrict the negotiability of a promissory note. Besides, the decision of the point was unnecessary in that case, inasmuch as the plaintiff's demand was for a sum less than the amount of the note. I cannot, therefore, consider that case as an authority that mere notice of the set-off makes any difference.—p. 698.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J.—I admit that in *Callaghan v. Gory v. Scott (1820) 3 B. & Ald. 619.
ABBOTT, C.J.—There is, however, great difficulty in distinguishing this case from Walwyn v. St. Quintin. But I must say that I cannot assent to the law there laid down; for, if notice had in that case been given to the drawer he might have had his remedy over against a third person.—p. 622.

Bickerdike v. Bollman, considered.

Laffite v. Slatter (1830) 6 Bing. 623; 4 M. & P. 467; 8 L. J. (O.S.) C. P. 273; 31 R. R. 510.

TINDAL, C.J.—Bickerdike v. Bollman has always been considered as an excepted case; and, perhaps, it applies only where the bill has been accepted for the accommodation of the drawer, who, in such case, if he knew that the acceptor had no assets, can incur no damage from want of notice. The principle of that case therefore is not to be extended. And in many other decisions, particularly in Rucker v. Hiller, it has been laid down that the drawer is entitled to notice if he have reasonable ground to expect the bill will be paid, although he have no assets in the acceptor's hands.—p. 626.

Cory v. Scott (supra), followed.

Chapman v. Keane (1835) 3 A. & E. 193; 4 N. & M. 607; 4 L. J. K. B. 185.

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—The objection to the plaintiff's recovery was founded on the case of Tindal v. Brown, in which all the judges of this Court, except Lord Mansfield, considered a notice given by one who was not the holder as no notice, on the ground that the drawer was not thereby apprised of the holder's intention to look to him for payment; and this case was distinctly recognised, and its principle adopted, by Lord Eldon, in Ex parte Barclay (7 Ves. 597). Notwithstanding these high authorities, it is clear from Jameson v. Swinton (2 Camp. 378), Wilson v. Swanley (1 Stark. 34), and also from the learned treatises on Bills of Exchange, that the contrary doctrine has prevailed in the profession, and we must presume a contrary practice in the commercial world. It is universally considered that the party entitled as holder to sue upon the bill may avail himself of notice given in due time by any party to it. In the nisi prius cases just referred to, no express allusion was made to Tindal v. Brown, or Ex parte Barclay, but we can hardly conceive that they were not present to the recollection of Lord Ellenborough and Lawrence, J., or the counsel engaged. These learned judges, indeed, decided them at nisi prius, but without question. We are now compelled to determine whether the case of Tindal v. Brown, as to this point, be good law. We think that it is not. If it were, the holder might secure his own right against his immediate indorser by regular notice; but the latter, and every other party to the bill, would be deprived of all remedy against anterior indorsers, and the drawer, unless each of those parties should in succession take up the bill immediately on receiving notice of dishonour, a supposition which cannot be reasonably made. We may add that this point was not necessary for the decision of the case, as this Court, including Lord Mansfield, granted a new trial on a different ground.—p. 197.

BAYLEY, J.—One short observation disposes of Warrington v. Furber and Swinyard v. Bowes, the authorities cited to show that it was not necessary in this case to prove presentment for payment. In those cases, the person insisting on the want of presentment was not a party to the bill; but here the defendant was a party to the notes, for they were payable to the bearer on demand, and he was the holder of them, and when such notes are passed from hand to hand the person taking them must trace his right through the former holder.—p. 381.

DENMAN, C.J.—In Messenger v. Southey (1 M. & G. 76), Tindal, C.J. admits that Hedger v. Stearnson (2 M. & W. 790) may have been properly decided; and in Furze v. Sharwood (2 Q. B. 414), we observed that "Messenger v. Southey shows a great relaxation of the rule laid down in the Exchequer Chamber [in Solarte v. Palmer (1 Cro. & J. 417)], and House of Lords [ibid. (1 N. Cas. 194)], on the part of the Lord Chief Justice, and that Boulton v. Welsh can hardly be now deemed a satisfactory authority."—p. 422.

Windle v. Andrews (1819) 2 B. & Ald. 696; 2 Stark. 425.

ABBOTT, C.J.—In Harris v. Benson, which arose in the 5 Geo. 2, it was held that the drawer of an inland bill of exchange was not chargeable with interest for want of a protest; and about two years subsequent to that decision, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas held, in the case of Rea v. Meggott, that a parol acceptance of an inland bill was not binding: both these points depend upon the same clause in the stat. 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9. Lord Hardwicke, however, shortly afterwards, in the case of Lumley v. Palmer, overruled the latter of these decisions, and the Court of King's Bench, upon argument, supported him in that opinion; to which the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas afterwards acceded. From that time to the present Lumley v. Palmer has been considered to be, and has been acted upon, as law.—p. 699.

MALINS, V.-C.—The authorities show that the broad proposition for which Ex parte Lambert was relied upon by the counsel for the official liquidator, namely, that the transferee of a bill after dishonour can under no circumstances have a better right against the acceptor than the drawer would have, cannot at this day be maintained, and, indeed, they most conclusively show that that case is no longer law.

THESSIGER, V.-C.—I will assume that Sleigh v. Sleigh was rightly decided, and therefore that the indorser of a bill of exchange, who pays it without having had any notice of dishonour, though he waives his right to have that notice, has no right of action against the person who is primarily liable to pay the bill. I will further assume that England v. Marsden was correctly decided; in other words, that, though a person who has been compelled to pay a bill of exchange has a right of action against the person primarily liable, he has no such right when he has voluntarily placed himself in the position of being compelled to make the payment. Though, however, I assume for the purpose of the present case that those cases were rightly decided, I will not say that I do not think they may be open to further consideration when the occasion for it arises, for I think that the observations of the late Mr. Justice Willes in Cook v. Lister are well worthy of consideration.—p. 417.

Steele v. McKinlay (1880) 5 App. Cas. 754; 43 L. T. 358; 29 W. R. 17.—H.L. (SC).

LORD BLACKBURN.—The case of Matthews v. Bloxsome was much, and properly, relied upon by the counsel for the appellants. It was one very peculiar in its circumstances. . . . It was perfectly manifest that the defendant gave authority to fill up the blank stamp paper in such a way as would make him liable as indorser to the plaintiffs, and meant that to be done; if the blanks had been filled up by the plaintiffs with the name of one of their clerks as drawer of a bill payable to bearer, there could have been no defence. But by a blunder of the plaintiffs, it was filled up inserting their own names as drawers. No one could help wishing to baffle such a defence. I was a party to the judgment of the Queen's Bench by which they did so, but I greatly doubt if it was sound. It seems to me to be a very violent thing to construe a document which, on the face of it, purported not to be drawn by the plaintiffs, and indorsed for them by the defendant, who purported to be the drawer, as being, in consequence of extrinsic evidence, in legal effect drawn by the defendant, and indorsed to the person who purported on it to be drawer. But the case, if good law, can only be an authority for considering a bill as if it were amended, so as to be what it was intended to be, when the evidence is clear what the intention was, and the bill was drawn up in its actual form by blunder.—p. 773.

LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—As the decision in the Court below was mainly rested upon the view taken by the Court of the proper construction of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1856, s. 11, and the subsequent Act of 1878 (41 Vict. c. 13), I think it right to add the expression of my own clear opinion that the Act of 1878 is in effect a declaration by the Legislature that the decision of the English Common Pleas Division in the case of Hindhaugh v. Blakey was erroneous; and, as no distinction whatever was made by the terms of the English enactment corresponding with the 11th section of the Scottish Act between one kind of acceptance and another, I think that the effect of that declaration, although in terms confined to an acceptance by the drawee of a bill (which was the actual case in Hindhaugh v. Blakey) is necessary to displace the whole construction of the English statute on which that decision was found.—p. 785.

Steele v. McKinlay, distinguished.

Holmes v. Amara Duxice (1883) 1 Cab. & E. 23. WILLIAMS, J.—The second point is that a bill of exchange being the creature of the law merchant, the defendant did not become an indorser to the plaintiffs of the bill in question, because, according to that law, the only person who becomes a true and proper indorser of a bill must be himself a holder to whom the bill has been transferred and who, by indorsement, transfers his rights to an indorsee, and that what the defendant did here was essentially different from this; that the defendant, if liable at all, could only be so upon a contract of suretyship which required to be verified by a memorandum in writing according to the Statute of Frauds; and that, there being no such memorandum in this case, the action must fail. In support of this contention, the opinion of Lord Blackburn in Steele v. McKinlay was

[Counsel urged that in Bacon v. Searles it was held that the indorsee of a bill of exchange, having received part of the contents from the drawer, could not recover more than the residue from the acceptor; and that when the drawer pays the whole, the acceptor is entirely discharged; and further, that the doctrine is repudiated, that, after receiving payment for the amount, the holder can be trustee for the drawer.]

LORD ABINGER, C.B.—If that be the principle of that case, it may be a question whether, if it were now considered, it would not be overruled.—p. 201.

Jones v. Broadhurst (1850) 9 C. B. 178.

CRESSWELL, J. (for the Court).—Considering this case of Bacon v. Searles with reference to the point decided—that part of a bill (accepted for value) being paid by a drawer or indorser, disentitles the indorsee to recover from the acceptor more than the balance remaining unpaid—it has been overruled by modern decisions, and is not now deemed to be law; and, if it is to be considered as the case of an accommodation bill, it is inapplicable to the questions which arise on this plea.—p. 186.

Jones v. Broadhurst, questioned.

Solomon v. Davis (1885) 1 Cab. & E. 83.

STEPHEN, J.—I am satisfied that Jones v. Broadhurst does not apply to this case (the case where a bill has been accepted for the accommodation of the drawer) at all, and I entertain some doubt whether Cook v. Lister (18 C. B. (N.S.) 543), a later decision of the same Court, has not greatly shaken the authority of Jones v. Broadhurst, although Jones v. Broadhurst is cited as an authority in a still later case in the Court of Common Pleas, viz., Thornton v. Maynard (L. R. 10 C. P. 695), which passes over Cook v. Lister unnoticed. . . . The judgment in Jones v. Broadhurst is, however, based upon the fact that the bill in that case was a bill for value, and it is repeatedly stated in the elaborate judgment that it has no application to accommodation bills. This is clearly pointed out in Cook v. Lister.

SIR MONTAGUE SMITH (for J. C.).—The case of De Bernales v. Fuller appears to be, in some degree, an exceptional one, and turned upon the precise circumstances existing in it. At first sight, it seems opposed to the general rule that a principal cannot sue a sub-agent for want of privity existing between them. The case has been referred to in several later decisions. It has never been overruled, and it has been put on a ground on which it may stand by Mr. Justice Maule in Warwick v. Rogers (5 M. & G. 340). He says: "In De Bernales v. Fuller, where money was paid into a banking-house for the purpose of taking up a particular bill which was lying there for payment, it was held to be money had and received to the use of the then owner and holder of the bill, and that it could not be applied by the bankers to the general account of the acceptor who paid the money, though the bankers' clerk had said at the time the money was paid in that he would not give up the bill till he had seen his master. But that decision turned upon the fact, that the money having been expressly paid into the defendants' house for the specific purpose declared at the time of taking up that particular bill, and that purpose not having been directly repudiated till afterwards, it must be taken to have been received at the time for the use of the holder of the bill." It would seem, therefore, that the case may be supported on the ground that money had been paid in specifically for the payment of the particular bill, and had been accepted by the bankers for that purpose, and that they made themselves, by so accepting the money, agents to hold it for the plaintiffs.—26 W. Overruled.

Marsh. 14.

MANSFIELD, C.J.—This case of Laxton v. Peat certainly is the first in which it was ever supposed that the acceptor of a bill of exchange was not the person and the last person compellable to pay that bill to the holder of it, and that anything could discharge the acceptor, except payment, or a release; and I never before knew that there was any difference between an acceptance given for accommodation, and an acceptance for value. When I first saw that case in Campbell, I was in the same state as Gibbs, J., and doubted a great deal whether it could be law. The case of Collett v. Haigh must be considered, not as a separate decision, but as resting on the authority of the former. It is utterly impossible for any judge, whatever his learning and abilities may be, to decide at once rightly upon every point which comes before him at nisi prius, and whoever looks through Campbell's Reports will be greatly surprised to see, among such an immense number of questions, many of them of the most important kind, which come before that noble and learned judge [Ellenborough], not that there are mistakes, but that he is in by far the most of the causes so wonderfully right, beyond the proportion of any other judges. But upon this case we think we are bound to differ from him, and to hold that it is impossible for us to consider the acceptor of an accommodation bill in the light of a surety for the payment of the drawer, and that we cannot therefore say that he is discharged by the indulgence shown to the drawer (p. 195). . . . The case before Gibbs, J. (Kerrison v. Cooke, 3 Camp. 362) has shaken this decision in Laxton v. Peat, and we think rightly.—p. 196.

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—The case of Bishop v. Chambre was cited on the trial for the plaintiff, and the marginal note appears favourable to him. But Lord Tenterden's proceeding on that occasion was, in truth, the other way; he permitted the jury to inspect the bill, to see if there had been any alteration, which there manifestly had, and then decided against the party producing it for want of proof that it was made before the instrument was complete.—p. 221.

L. J. Q. B. 285; 1 Jar. (N.S.) 828; 3 W. R. 460
CAMPBELL, C.J. (for the Court).—That case certainly does very nearly resemble the present. The defendant had, as surety, signed a joint and several promissory note with the principal debtor, having no reason to suppose that any one else was to sign it. Afterwards the payee, without the knowledge of the defendant, induced another person to sign it, with a view to strengthen the security; and the Court held that the defendant was liable still upon it. But the decision took place merely on refusing a rule to show cause why there should not be a new trial. It seems to have proceeded on the ground that, as the new surety could not be liable on the note by reason of the stamp laws, the alteration operated nothing, although the counsel urged that "a note with an altered date does not bind any one to the new contract, yet the old contract is void." The judgment of the Court was without further reasons in these words: "In the absence of all authority, we shall hold that this was not an alteration of the note, but merely an addition which had no effect." With sincere respect to the learned judges who concurred in this decision, we feel bound to say that, in our opinion, it is contrary to the authorities, and that it is not law.—p. 90.

[The second resolution in Pigot's Case stated that, "if the obligee himself alters the deed . . . although it is in words not material, yet the deed is void."]

LUSH, J. (for the Court).—This being the state of the authorities we think we are not bound by the doctrine in Pigot's Case, or the authority cited for it; and, not being bound, we are certainly not disposed to lay it down as a rule of law that the addition of words which cannot possibly prejudice any one, destroys the validity of the note. It seems to us repugnant to justice and common sense to hold that the maker of a promissory note is discharged from his obligation to pay it because the holder has put in writing on the note what the law would have supplied if the words had not been written.—p. 579.

Paton v. Winter (1809) 1 Taunt. 420.

LAWRENCE, J. observed that in Master v. Miller (4 T. R. 320), three judges against Buller, J. thought there must have been some mistake in Molloy's account of that decision, or that the case was not law; and that Lord Kenyon, C.J. held that the case did not conflict with Master v. Miller, because there the acceptance only was altered, but there was no alteration of the bill itself: in Master v. Miller it was held that an alteration made in the bill vitiated the bill against all parties.—p. 423.

Hirschman v. Budd (1878) 42 L. J. Ex. 113; L. R. 8 Ex. 171; 28 L. T. 602; 21 W. R. 582.

KELLY, C.B.—But then we are pressed with the authority of Parry v. Nicholson, and especially with the observation there attributed to Parke, B., that the date of a bill is immaterial. Now, there can be no question that in some cases the date would be immaterial, and, although altered, the defendant would still be bound. In Parry v. Nicholson the facts are not clearly stated; and the decision may perhaps be supported on the ground that, according to the evidence there given, the date was immaterial. But I cannot think that the learned judge could have laid down as a general principle that the date of a bill is not material, although it may have been true as to the particular case; and the cases he referred to do not by any means bear out any such general proposition. I will add, especially with regard to Hemming v. Treney (9 A. & E. 926), on which he bases his judgment, that it was an action on a guarantee. The plea was non assumpsit. Upon the trial it was proved that the instrument had been interlined; but the first count of the declaration was upon it in its original form, and it was held very properly that the defence of alteration ought to have been specially pleaded.

Macartney v. Graham (1828) 2 Sim. 285.

SHADWELL, V.C.—The case of Moscop v. Eadon has been overruled by the decision in Hansard v. Robinson (7 B. & C. 90).—p. 287.

Macartney v. Graham, questioned.

Hansard v. Robinson (1828) 7 B. & C. 90; R. & M. 404, n.; 3 D. & R. 860; 5 L. J. (o.s.) K. B. 242; 31 R. R. 166, not followed.

PAGE-WOOD, V.C.—In Hansard v. Robinson a Court of law refused relief in case of a lost bill of exchange; and the learned judge who decided Macartney v. Graham there said that Hansard v. Robinson had overruled Moscop v. Eadon. That is hardly correct. The real effect of that decision is, that it cut away the principle on which relief was refused in such cases in equity. Sir W. Grant said that a suit in equity could not be sustained, because relief would be given at law in case of a lost bill of exchange. The Court of law has since held that relief cannot be given at law.

Woolsey v. Crawford (1810) 2 Camp. 445, impeached.

Walker v. Hamilton (1861) 1 De G. F. & J. 602. CAMPBELL, L.C.—Woolsey v. Crawford is at most a non prius case, and the point there decided only applied to the re-exchange, not to a sum which was liquidated, which could have been easily ascertained: and as to this non prius case, if it had been expressly in point, I should have said that it could not at all outweigh the solemn decision of Francis v. Rucker.—p. 611.

Woolsey v. Crawford and Napier v. Schneider

(1810) 12 East 420, treated as overruled. General South American Co., In re (1877) 47 L. J. Ch. 67; 7 Ch. D. 637; 37 L. T. 899; 26 W. R. 232.

MALINS, V.C.—It has been argued before me at considerable length that, although a drawer is liable to pay the re-exchange—and it is immaterial whether this is re-exchange in the strict sense of the word or not—an acceptor is not liable to do so. The only two authorities relied upon, in support of that proposition, are Woolsey v. Crawford and Napier v. Schneider. Now I think that after the decision of the Court of Appeal in Walker v. Hamilton (supra), those authorities must be considered as overruled. Lord Campbell, in giving judgment in that case, does not, in terms, overrule them; but he speaks of Woolsey v. Crawford as a mere non prius decision, and of Napier v. Schneider as a case in which, if the percentage had been fixed, the result would probably have been different. I cannot, therefore, accede to the argument that the drawer of a bill of exchange is under a greater liability than the acceptor.—p. 68.

NORTH, J.—It appears from Francis v. Rucker that a liquidated sum of 20 per cent. was substituted for re-exchange in the State of Pennsylvania, and from Roberts, Ex parte (infra), it appears that in Tobago a liquidated sum of 10 per cent. has been substituted for re-exchange. I have considered whether it would be possible to treat the 10 per cent. in the present case as really a liquidated sum in lieu of re-exchange. But there are difficulties about that, particularly having regard to Willans v. Ayers.—p. 134.

Commercial Bank of South Australia, In re, supra.

NORTH, J.—That, therefore, is a decision on sect. 57 of the English Act [the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882], which is identical with that with which I have now to deal [sect. 57 of the South Australian Bills of Exchange Act, 1884], that, in the case of a bill dishonoured abroad—that is, in a place foreign to that where it is drawn and indorsed—the remedy is under sub-sect. 2 for re-exchange. That sub-section in each of the Acts is founded, not upon anything peculiar to the law either of England or of Australia, but upon the general law of merchants, and is of international application. . . . It seems to me, therefore, that this claim for interest [under sub-sect. 1] is wrong.—p. 133.

Gillespie, In re, Roberts, Ex parte; and Prehn v. Royal Bank of Liverpool (1870) 39 L. J. Ex. 41; L. R. 5 Ex. 92; 21 L. T. 830; 18 W. R. 463, explained and distinguished.

CHITTY, J.—Now it is plain, on a comparison of sects. 51 and 57, that a distinction is drawn between protests which are necessary, and those which are not necessary, but merely permissive. Where the bill is dishonoured by non-payment, it "must" be duly protested for non-payment—sect. 51, sub-sect. 2; where the acceptor (as here) suspends payment before the bill matures, the holder "may" cause the bill to be protested for better security—sect. 51, sub-sect. 5; and sect. 57 makes the expenses of protest recoverable against the acceptor only when the protest is necessary. It appears to me that the language of these sections is definite and precise, and that the expenses of an unnecessary protest are not recoverable. I cannot see my way to deal with the case of expenses of protest on the principle adopted by the C. A. in Gillespie, In re, in reference to the question of damages for re-exchange which they had to decide, or to treat it as a *casus omnis*us letting in sect. 97. . . .

My observations on the claim for the expenses of the protest for better security apply generally to the claim for commission. The claim was supported principally on sect. 97, and the doctrine of damages for re-exchange. Here also the text-books and the authorities have been searched with the same result as above-mentioned, and no evidence has been adduced of any mercantile custom. One authority only was relied on—namely, Prehn v. Royal Bank of Liverpool. But the action there was brought, not on the bill of exchange, but on a special contract which justified the Court in allowing the claim for commission as special damages. The decision, therefore, is not in point.—pp. 280, 281.

CAMPBELL, C.J.—With reference to the second objection I do not see that there is any reason for supposing that the magistrate's actual name is not "J. H. Hamper." The objections which might be raised as to this point upon a bill of exchange do not appear to me to apply to proceedings like these. Nor can I acquiesce in the distinction suggested, in Lomax v. Landells, between a consonant and a vowel. There is no doubt that a vowel may be a good christian name; why not a consonant? I have been informed by a gentleman of the bar, sitting here, on whose accuracy we can rely, that he knows a lady who was baptised by the name of "D." Why may not a gentleman as well be baptised by a consonant?—p. 61.

ABBOTT, C.J.—The only point decided in Pacock v. Billing was, that in an action on a bill of exchange, declarations of a prior holder could not be received, unless they were made when he had possession of the bill. That which fell from the Lord Chief Justice as to such declarations being admissions, and receivable when adverse to the interest of the party making them, was extra-judicial, and such observations are always to be taken rather as illustrations than as authorities in law, for we all know that they are constantly made without the same consideration and care as those which belong to the point in judgment.—p. 328.

CAMPBELL, C.J. (for the Court).—In Brown v. Philpot there was a plea that the bill had been accepted by the defendant without consideration and had been fraudulently endorsed without consideration to a person who endorsed it to the plaintiff without consideration. And Lord Denman is reported to have ruled that after the defendant had proved that the bill was accepted by him without consideration, and that it had been fraudulently endorsed without consideration to the person who endorsed it to the plaintiff, the defendant was farther bound to prove, in support of the plea, by express evidence, that the bill had been endorsed to the plaintiff without consideration. But with the most sincere respect for the judge who is said to have so ruled, I must observe that it was at most a nisi prius decision, and that the point does not seem to have been pressed or much argued, the defendant's counsel having contented himself with stating what he could and what he could not prove, and no authority being cited except Heath v. Sansom, which had been before considerably shaken. The case of Bailey v. Bidwell, in which a contrary rule is laid down, was solemnly decided by the Court of Exchequer in banc for years after, and has been frequently acted upon since. We are therefore, of opinion, that Brown v. Philpot cannot now be considered as an authority by which we ought to be governed.—p. 289.

PARKE, B.—The only authorities in support of the present affidavit are Weedon v. Medley and Irring v. Heaton. The former case was clearly decided on the mere ground that the want of an averment of presentment was not a sufficient objection, and the Court did not look into the affidavit to say whether there was an averment of refusal. Then Irring v. Heaton, as appears from the report, went on the authority of Weedon v. Medley. The weight of authority, therefore, is decidedly against the sufficiency of the affidavit.—p. 299.

M'Lean v. Clydesdale Banking Co. (1883) 9 App. Cas. 95; 50 L. T. 457.—H.L. (SC.). LORDS SELBORNE, L.C., BLACKBURN and WATSON.

LORD WATSON.—I have no doubt that, according to the law of Scotland, a cheque in the form of that which was given by the appellant Cotton is a negotiable instrument, in other words, is substantially a bill, attended with many, though not all, of the privileges of a bill. The law upon this point appears to me to be stated with great accuracy by the late Lord Cowan in the case of Macdonald v. Union Bank. His lordship there said, "A banker's draft or cheque according to all the authorities, and according to the practice of bankers, is a negotiable instrument; and such documents are as negotiable as bills of exchange or promissory notes."—p. 113.

The learned counsel who opened the case rested his argument upon De la Chaumette v. Bank of England. But it is impossible to accept that decision as an authority according to the interpretation which the appellant's counsel put upon it. I prefer the explanation of the ground of judgment given by the late Lord Hatherley in the case of Misa v. Currie in this House. His lordship said [at p. 870], "It appeared from the circumstances of that case, that the party suing was suing simply as an agent of a person who was bound to show that he had given good and valuable consideration." If that be taken to be (what in my opinion it is) a correct representation of the ground of judgment in De la Chaumette v. Bank of England, how is it possible to regard that case as an authority for the proposition that a third party taking a cheque in payment of an account, and not taking or holding it as agent for the person who gave it him, does not hold it for value? But the rationes upon which, apart from all authority on the point, I should proceed as a matter of principle, are fully expressed in the opinion of the majority of the judges in the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the case of Moss v. Currie. It is true that another ground of judgment was adopted by the House of Lords when that case came before them on appeal; but I cannot find anything in the "observations" made by the noble and learned lords who decided Moss v. Currie in this House, calculated to throw the least discredit upon the doctrine laid down by the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, whilst, on the contrary, I find a great deal which tends to support the view taken by the majority.—p. 114.

LORD BROUGHAM (for J. It is equally admitted, on the other hand, that if they had the authority to endorse, their endorsement passed the property. It may be taken as also established that whatever may have been the law laid down in Gill v. Cubitt and Down v. Halling, and one or two other cases, and not abandoned, at least as far as the language went which the Court used in some subsequent cases, is now no longer law; and that the negligence of the party taking a negotiable instrument does not fix him with the defective title of the party passing it to him.—p. 71.

CLEASBY, B.—The only reason for reversing our judgment in a case otherwise clear was the concluding sentence in the judgment of Mr. Justice Blackburn in Austin v. Bunyard, in which he intimates an opinion that probably the knowledge of the person that the cheque was post-dated when he took it might make a difference. But this would not show that the instrument itself was improperly stamped, but that a different instrument ought to have been drawn with a different stamp. The consideration that the revenue might be defeated by what was done has nothing to do with the admissibility of the instrument. Legislation might prevent this, but such legislation, if directed to the admissibility of the instrument, would cause great inconvenience. The authorities are also decisive upon this view of the case.—p. 306.

KEATING, J.—Young v. Grote was much discussed in Ex parte Swan (30 L. J. C. P. 113; 7 C. B. (N.S.) 400). But I think you will find that Young v. Grote is there treated as an exceptional case.—p. 853.

BRETT, L.J.—In Ingham v. Primrose the acceptor of a bill of exchange, with the intention of cancelling it, tore it into two pieces and threw them into the street; they were picked up by the endorser, joined together, and put into circulation. The acceptor was held liable, because, said the Court, though he did intend to cancel it, he did not cancel it. I cannot support that case on such a ground; and the honest way of dealing with it is to say we do not agree with it. In Young v. Grote, Young left a blank cheque with his wife, and in filling up the cheque for 50*l.*, the word "fifty" was written in the middle of the line, ample space being left for the insertion of other words by a forgery before the word "fifty." The words "three hundred and" were inserted. Notwithstanding the forgery, the Court held Young liable because he had been negligent in giving a blank cheque to his wife to fill up, and they also held that his wife was negligent in filling up the cheque by writing in the middle of the line. It is said that the case may be upheld on the ground that Young owed a duty to his own bankers, and that he was guilty of negligence in not drawing his cheques on them with ordinary care; but that case does not govern the present, it only applies where the persons defrauded are the defendant's own bankers (p. 627). . . . I think the observations made by the lords in The Bank of Ireland v. Evans' Trustees (5 H. L. Cas. 389) have shaken Young v. Grote and Coles v. Bank of England (10 A. & E. 437) as authorities.—p. 628.

[Headnote.—There is no duty incumbent upon the acceptor of a bill of exchange towards the public or subsequent holders of the bill to see that the bill is in such a form as to prevent the possibility of fraudulent alteration after it has left his hands. Censorship over the form of the instrument is no part of his duty.]

The relation of an acceptor to subsequent holders is not the same as that of a customer to a banker, as the duty of a customer arises directly out of the contractual relation existing at the time between him and the banker, who is his mandatory. There is no such connection between the acceptor and possible future indorsees of a bill of exchange.

may be filled in on the cheque, although the fact be that the customer limited the authority of the person to whom he entrusted the cheque to an authority to fill it up for a less sum than that appearing on the face of the cheque; and I am unable to find any sufficient reason for distinguishing between an order for the payment of money and an order for the delivery of goods.—p. 845.

MELLISH, L.J.—Shepherd v. Harrison is a direct illustration of the distinction we have been pointing out. In that case the consignor did take the precaution of making the goods deliverable to his own order, and of forwarding

the indorsed bill of lading together with the bill of exchange to an agent of his own. The agent forwarded the bill of lading and the bill of exchange in the same letter to the consignee, and requested him to accept the bill of exchange, and return it. Under these circumstances it was held by the House of Lords that the consignee

had no right to keep the bill of lading

without accepting the bill of exchange. This case is no authority for holding that if the property in the goods had already passed, the property would revert on the bills of exchange being refused acceptance.—p. 288.

—MATHEW, J.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—It was however argued that what Lord Westbury and Lord Cairns said in Shepherd v. Harrison shows that I am wrong, but I do not think so. What those noble and learned lords were dealing with was the passing of property in goods contained in a bill of lading

to a purchaser, he not accepting the draft accompanying the bill of lading. . . . The noble and learned lords were not dealing with the effect of the Factors Acts, which was not before them, and with which they had nothing to do. . . .

The Legislature, when it passed the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, by sect. 19, sub-sect. 3, enacted

what had been held by the House of Lords in Shepherd v. Harrison, and nothing more, the

COLLINS, L.J.—The whole point (in Shepherd

v. Harrison) was whether the true owner had shown that he intended to reserve to himself the ius disponendi in the goods so as to negative the inference that the property in them had passed to the person to whom a bill of lading indorsed in blank had been handed by the owner's agent together with a bill of exchange for the price of the acceptance. The handing over the bill of lading under such conditions clearly did not rebut

the conclusive evidence from the transaction itself that the seller intended to preserve his ius disponendi until the acceptance of the bill of exchange, and that therefore no property in the goods passed to the plaintiff by the delivery of the bill of lading. It was not a question what title the buyer, having no title himself, could pass to a bond fide purchaser, but whether he could make title against the seller himself, a point wholly outside the special legislation of these Acts, which are based, as I have shown, on a constructive misleading of third persons. The decision and the dicta are addressed to this point only.—p. 528.

JAMES, L.J.—I am not prepared to say that merely because a bill of exchange purports to be drawn against a particular cargo it carries a lien on that cargo into the hands of every holder of the bill. In Frith v. Forbes there were grounds for saying that the intention was to give Frith, Sands & Co. an equitable interest in the cargo, for the letters of the consignor to the consignees referred to bills of exchange which the consignor had drawn in favour of Frith, Sands & Co. . . . JAMES, L.J.—The case of Frith v. Forbes must not be misunderstood. The Court there held, that in a transaction between principal and agent a direction given by the principal to the agent as to the application of the proceeds of the sale of particular goods was binding on the agent, and that he could not set up against it his own general lien. But that decision has nothing whatever to do with a transaction between vendor and purchaser.—p. 480.

COTTON, L.J.—I should also mention that in another case referred to—Ex parte Deyer (supra)—not only did I say that *Frith v. COTTON, L.J.—That is a case which has been constantly mentioned, but never, I think, followed in any other case. Possibly there has never been a case so much like Frith v. Forbes as the present; but we cannot disregard what has been said by Lord Justice James, that Frith v. Forbes "turned upon special circumstances, and can hardly be treated as governing any other case." Now, if that case is to govern the present, the lord justice, when he said it turned on special circumstances, must really have spoken in disregard of what, I suppose, is a most common practice between merchants abroad and merchants in England, viz., that goods are remitted with a letter stating that they are remitted, and that certain bills have been drawn against them, and that the bills of exchange do also refer on their face to the consignments in the same way. He must have considered that there was something special in the circumstances of that case showing that there was an appropriation in favour of the consignor, and showing that there was a transfer of that appropriation to the bill-holders, which we cannot gather distinctly from the report. . . . Unfortunately, we cannot find in the report of Frith v. Forbes what was the ground upon which the judges decided that there was an appropriation in favour of the consignors. It may be that there were letters or circumstances which tended to support the judges in that conclusion, and Begbie & Co. did not in fact dispute it, because, although, as pointed out by Mr. Carson, it is evident that both below and in the Court of Appeal, Begbie & Co. were represented, yet they seem to have taken in neither Court any strong part in arguing against the rights of the bill-holders. If the lords justices did in that case lay down that a letter, such as this is, without anything more, constitutes an appropriation in favour of the consignor, so that the goods must be kept as a specifically appropriated fund, in his favour, I should say they drew a conclusion which is not justified, and the sooner this Court says that, in my opinion, the better. It may be that there was other evidence, but, in my opinion, it is not the correct conclusion from letters of advice, such as this is, that there was an appropriation in favour of the consignor, that the proceeds of the goods shall be kept as a specific fund appropriated for the payment of bills. That, in my opinion, would be a wrong conclusion, and, as far as one can see (and this was pressed upon us by Mr. Carson), that was all the evidence that the judges had in Frith v. Forbes.—p. 865.

I found a difficulty in that case in arriving at a contract between the acceptor of a bill upon the faith of the letter of credit and the person who gave the letter. The lords justices held, and I was very glad they did so, that the letter was given for the express purpose of being exhibited to all the world, and that all the world was invited to trust the representations of the persons who had given the letter, and therefore those persons were held bound. But there is nothing of the kind here. There is nothing on the face of the bills to show that any such guarantee as that existed.—p. 756.

KAY, L.J.—Here the description of the grantee is "the Discount Bank of London, of which bank L. Simmons is the sole proprietor." The Discount Bank of London might be the name of a corporation, and is there any irresistible inference from what appears on the bill of sale that it was not? Unless there is such inference, Bird v. Davey does not apply, and the bill of sale is bad. . . . To say that there is any irresistible inference that the Discount Bank of London was the trade name of Simmons is going too far.

THESIGER, L.J.—But it is said, on the other hand, that there have been two or three cases decided which are contrary to the views expressed by Mr. Justice Lindley, and to the decision at which we are arriving. I do not think it necessary to decide or discuss whether or not those cases were properly decided, because in my view they are fairly distinguishable from the present case, looking at the facts to which I have already adverted. The first case is Thomson v. Barrett. . . . The jury found that it was a mere receipt, and Cockburn, C.J., in his judgment, comments upon that fact, and makes it a portion of the argument which leads him to the conclusion at which he arrives. Crompton, J. also says, "The jury having found that this document was not a record of the transaction, it does not require to be registered. Therefore you have two circumstances distinguishing that case from the present, namely, first, that there was a verbal arrangement, a complete agreement, apart from the document in the form of a receipt, and which was found by the jury to be a mere receipt; and secondly, that the whole of the transaction was not reduced to writing, but only a receipt for a portion of the purchase-money." The next case referred to was Allsopp v. Day. . . . The third case is Byerley v. Prevost, and it partakes of the circumstances of the other two. There was first a verbal arrangement for a purchase, then a verbal arrangement for the reletting of the goods, and then there was a simple receipt for the purchase-money. As I have already observed, it is not absolutely necessary to say whether those cases were rightly decided; but I must add that, if on any future occasion circumstances should arise identical with those in Allsopp v. Day, Byerley v. Prevost, and Thomson v. Barrett—at all events the first two—I think it would be very desirable that those cases should receive further discussion and consideration.—p. 90.

JAMES, L.J. (for the Court).—In the recent case of Ex parte Odell (supra) two members of this Court expressed doubts as to the correctness of the decision in Allsopp v. Day. We do not, however, on the present occasion, think it necessary to go into any minute examination of Allsopp v. Day. There was this apparent distinction between that case and the present, that there the two documents, the inventory and the receipt, were not written on the same piece of paper, and did not together form the title to the property. The title was made out by means of a parcel evidence connecting the receipt with the inventory which was referred to in a letter containing the receipt. Nor is it necessary to criticise the other cases that followed Allsopp v. Day (Dyerley v. Preece) because so far as regards the general law, those cases have been entirely swept away by the new Bills of Sale Act (41 & 42 Vict. c. 81). . . . Though I do not think it necessary to go further into those cases, yet if, as has been pressed upon us in argument, the logical sequence of them is that such a document as the one before us is not an "assurance" requiring registration, we should be compelled to express our dissent from them or at least our inability to follow the logical sequence with regard to this particular document.—p. 321.

JESSEL, M.R.—The difficulty in this case is occasioned by the decision in Ex parte Cooper, In re Baum; it is not easy to discover the principle upon which the judgment proceeded; but we have had the benefit of some remarks made by Thesiger, L.J. as to that case, and those remarks show that the decision may be explained upon an intelligible principle. That principle is, that independently of the document there was no sale of the goods, that there was one transaction constituted by the inventory and the receipt thereto attached, and that if there had been no document there would have been no transaction. Accordingly, the lords justices held that the document was an "assurance" within the Bills of Sale Act, 1854, and required registration. But we have now to deal with a case where the facts are of a different nature.—p. 26.

BOWEN, L.J. (for self, COLERIDGE, G.J. and BRETT, M.R.).—The learned counsel for the appellant contended that the previously-exempted case of such building agreements was directly met by the new words which the Act of 1878 for the first time introduced into the interpretation clause, and that the present agreement must be registered as being an agreement by which a right in equity to personal chattels is conferred. On the part of the respondent it was urged that a right to after-acquired property was not a right to personal chattels within the meaning of the Act of 1878. It is not necessary to pronounce an authoritative decision on this very grave point (as to which, see per Lord Chelmsford, Holroyd v. Marshall), because in our judgment whatever right is conferred by the clause of the building agreement now under discussion, is not a right in equity at all, but a right at law. Down to the time when the building materials were brought upon the landlord's premises, there was no contract relating to any specific goods at all, nor anything which could be subject to a decree for specific performance. The contract was only to apply to goods when brought upon the premises, and until this happened, there was no right or interest in equity to any goods at all. Upon the other hand, the moment the goods were brought upon the premises the property in them passed in law, and nothing was left upon which any equity as distinct from law could attach. No further performance of the contract was necessary, nor could be enforced. The builder's agreement accordingly was at no time an equitable assignment of anything, but a mere legal contract that, upon the happening of a particular event, the property in law should pass in certain chattels which that event itself would identify without the necessity of any further act on the part of anybody, and which could not be identified before. Reeve v. Whitmore and Holroyd v. Marshall have, therefore, no immediate bearing on the present case. If the present agreement does not fall within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, as conferring a right in equity, it is still governed by the decisions in Brown v. Bateman and Blake v. Izard, authorities which, for the reasons we have mentioned, we are not prepared to review.—p. 442.

DENMAN, J.—It was . . . argued that inasmuch as in this case there was a power to sell any part of the materials upon the land separately upon default in the performance of any part of the mortgagor's agreements, including that to repay the 6½, which was advanced upon the execution of the deed, the case fell within the requirements of the Bills of Sale Act, according to the tests given by the C. A., especially in Burdett, In re, and in Yates, In re. We do not think that Burdett, In re, goes at all further than to decide that where a deed is executed which mortgages both personal chattels and other property, such deed is valid as regards the other property if it is possible to sever the provisions of the deed into two parts, so as to apply its provisions to each species of property independently of the other. . . . Yates, In re, the other case relied upon by the plaintiffs, lays down a test which seems to us applicable to the present case. . . . The decision . . . was against the application of the Bills of Sale Act to such a case [as was there considered]. But the ground of that decision was one which cannot apply to a case like the present in which the "chattels" seized are pure chattels, and in which the power to deal with them is not a power to be derived from an Act of Parliament, but from the agreement of the parties themselves.—pp. 350, 351.

WRIGHT, J.—It has long been settled that an ordinary building agreement between a landowner and a builder is not brought within the Bills of Sale Acts as regards plant and materials merely by reason of a provision in it that the plant and materials, when brought upon the land, are to be considered as annexed to the land or are to become the property of the lessor: Brown v. Bateman; Blake v. Izard; Newitt, Ex parte; Reeves v. Barlow. . . . The document, however, which is now in question is not of that kind. It is not an agreement between landlord and builder, but is a mere mortgage by a builder of his interest in a building agreement to a stranger, to secure money advanced by the stranger to enable the builder to carry out the building agreement, and is subject to all the ordinary incidents of a mortgage. It purports to assign the plant and materials now or hereafter to be brought on the ground, or adjoining thereto, to the lender absolutely, subject to redemption, and authorises him, in case the builder impairs the security by delay in building, &c., "to enter on the land and complete the buildings, and for that purpose to take possession of the land and of all plant and materials thereon." . . . Apart from other authority, I should be of opinion that this mortgage requires registration as a bill of sale in respect of the plant and materials. But Climpson v. Coles, which was decided subsequently to all the other cases cited, raises a difficulty. In that case the document in question was a mortgage, and the Court, no doubt, appear to have expressed the opinion that the same considerations applied to that mortgage as in the case of an ordinary building agreement. But they did not decide the case on that ground, and there are two circumstances which appear to me to distinguish that case from this. In the first place, so far as can be gathered from the reports, the mortgage appears to have been the owner of the land. In the second place, his covenant was that the plant and materials to be brought upon the premises should be considered as immediately attached to, and forming part of, the fee-simple of the premises. This provision seems to bring the case directly within the principle of Brown v. Bateman and the cases which followed it, and was probably the ground of the expressions to which I have referred in Climpson v. Coles. That case, therefore, is not an authority against the view I have taken.—pp. 141, 142, 143.

HERSCHELL, L.C.—With regard to Coburn v. Collins, upon which reliance was placed, that seems to me to be a very different case from the present one. That was an agreement for the sale of a business, the price of which no doubt was to be paid at a future time. There was no agreement between the parties in that case that the property should not pass at once. There were none of these stipulations such as one finds here as to the use of that which was the subject of the agreement to sell. In this case the intending purchaser cannot sell, assign, sublet, or even remove from one building to another this gas engine, the property of which is supposed to be in him; in Cibery v. Collier it was the sale of a business in the case where the purchaser was intending to continue the business and to sell the stock-in-trade—two contracts of a very different nature. In the next place there, in terms, the vendors were to have a lien or charge until the full price was paid—a lien or charge implying that the property had passed to others, for a man does not have a lien on his own property or a charge either. Therefore, in that case there were provisions in the agreement which pointed to the intention being that the substance of the transaction was a sale, in which the property passed with a security, eo instanti, given by the purchaser to the vendor. That decision does not seem to me to be in the slightest degree inconsistent with the conclusion at which your lordships have arrived in the present case.—p. 134.

ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that the words of sect. 9 [of Bills of Sale Act, 1882] strike at all documents which give a security upon goods for the payment of money, and I take it that the legislature intended to say, if you cannot make your agreement by a document in the form specified in the schedule, you shall not be able to make it by any document at all. I cannot, therefore, agree with the ratio decidendi of either of the two cases which have been relied upon. But I think that Ex parte Close was obviously rightly decided, because the document there in question was one of those which are excepted by the proviso at the end of sect. 4 of the Act of 1878, and for that reason it was not within the Act. In In re Cunningham, Pearson, J. did not follow the actual decision in Ex parte Close, but he applied the doctrine which was not necessary to the decision of that case, and I think he intended to agree with that doctrine. If his decision required the application of that doctrine I cannot agree with the decision; if it did not, still I cannot agree with the doctrine.—p. 345.

ESHER, M.R.—It appears that the only difficulty which was felt by the Divisional Court arose out of the interpretation which they put on some of the language which was used by this Court in Ex parte Parsons. With great deference to the learned judges, I think that, if they had examined the judgments delivered in Ex parte Parsons as a whole, they would have seen that they have been attributing to us that which we never intended to say. In coming to the conclusion at which they did arrive, they must have thought that we intended in Ex parte Parsons to overrule several recent cases in this Court, to the decision of which some of us had been parties. All that we then intended to say about Ex parte Close and In re Cunningham & Co. was with reference to what we supposed (whether rightly or wrongly) to have been the ratio decidendi of those cases. In my judgment in Ex parte Parsons, I said: "Then this difficulty arises, that two learned judges, for whose opinion we have the greatest respect, have in substance held this—that, when there is such an ordinary transaction as an advance of money upon the security of goods, the arrangement being that the possession of the goods is to be given to the lender immediately, you cannot by any possibility express the transaction in the statutory form, and therefore the legislature could not have intended to deal with such a transaction at all. The true conclusion must, therefore, be that sect. 9 does not apply to a document by which the right to immediate possession of goods is given. The legislature could not have intended to prevent such transactions altogether?" That shows what we supposed to have been the ratio decidendi in Ex parte Close and In re Cunningham & Co. I went on to say, "Is that a process of reasoning which the Court ought to allow?" But Cave, J. in his judgment in Ex parte Parsons, explains that he did not intend to say what he was supposed to have said in Ex parte Close. It is strange, however, that Lindley, L.J., in Ex parte Parsons, had exactly the same idea about the ratio decidendi of Ex parte Close and In re Cunningham & Co. as I had, for he said, "It appears to me that the reasoning of the judges in the two cases which have been cited—that, because you cannot express a transaction in the form given in the schedule to the Act of 1882, therefore, the Act does not apply to it—is erroneous." Perhaps we ought now to set the matter right by saying that if the learned judges in those two cases had used that process of reasoning, we could not have agreed with them; and, if that word "if" had been inserted, the learned judges in the present case could hardly have come to the conclusion at which they arrived as to the meaning of Ex parte Parsons. The ground, therefore, of their judgment cannot be supported. . . . The decision of the Divisional Court was wrong, but it was wrong only by reason of their wrongly interpreting the language used in Ex parte Parsons, and giving to it a meaning which it will not properly bear.—p. 695.

BLACKBURN, J.—If the mortgagee intended an additional security to convey his right to sever the fixtures, I should think, if the matter were res integra, that the conveyance of the fixtures must be treated as a bill of sale of personal chattels, and would require registration. There is, however, a decision to the contrary; for in Boyd v. Shorrook, certain persons were tenants for years of a mill, and owners of certain trade fixtures therein; they mortgaged the mill and the trade fixtures, but the assignment was not registered as a bill of sale; and Wood, V.-C. held that the fixtures passed to the mortgagee without registration. I agree with Malins, V.-C. in Begbie v. Fenwick, that it is difficult to understand the grounds on which Wood, V.-C. arrived at that conclusion.
If Boyd v. Shorrook stood alone, I should wish to take time to consider this case, but Begbie v.
Fenwick is a conflicting authority, and was decided by a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction.
We have therefore two authorities of equal weight opposed to each other, and I prefer to follow the later decision.—p. 293.

LORD SELBORNE—It is very frankly admitted that, in a case in the Court of Queen's Bench, in which a decision, which your lordships are not in any way called upon to review or express an opinion upon, as to the effect of the Registration Act, was given, in the case of Richards v. James, decided in the year 1867, it was expressly laid down, apart from the events of bankruptcy or execution, the Bills of Sale Act would have no operation whatever as against an unregistered assignment of fixtures. The circumstances of that case were these. There were two persons who had assignments of certain trade fixtures of a person who afterwards had an execution issued against his goods. The first assignee, Spark, had not registered his assignment; the second, Hollingsworth, had; the fixtures were taken in execution and recovered by Hollingsworth, the registered assignee, second in order of time from the execution creditor. The Court of Queen's Bench held that as the first assignee could not have set up any title against the execution creditor, the title of Hollingsworth, which had prevailed by reason of registry against the execution creditor, was not to give way to the title of Spark; in other words, that Hollingsworth could retain against Spark what he had recovered, and that Spark could not have recovered from the execution creditor. And what the Court said as to the position in which things would have stood, had there been an execution, was this: "Had it not been for Hollingsworth's subsequent registered bill of sale, the execution creditor would have been entitled to the proceeds of the goods seized. It is equally clear, on the other hand, that had there been no execution, and had the question been merely which of the two claimants was entitled to priority against the other, Spark's claim would have prevailed, because there is nothing in the Act which makes it necessary to register a bill of sale against the holder of a subsequent bill of sale, whether the latter be registered or not." According to my recollection, which is imperfect and possibly may be erroneous, in Begbie v. Fenwick, also the mortgagor had become bankrupt before the question arose; and there being in that case a competition between a prior unregistered assignee and a subsequent registered assignee, if I am right in thinking that the additional fact occurred of bankruptcy by the mortgagor, the case might be brought within the reach of the same principle with Richards v. James.—p. 486.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Undoubtedly there are expressions which at first sight appear to warrant the notion that Mr. Justice Blackburn was of opinion that where a mortgagor was demising land of which he was tenant for a term of years, and fixtures of which he was absolute owner, a mortgage in ordinary form would not pass the fixtures. But I do not think Lord Blackburn really meant that. What he meant to say, as I understand it, was that prima facie such a mortgagor must not be taken to grant the fixtures as chattels separately assigned or to do more than include them with the land in the sub-demise. And this view of his meaning is fortified by his language in Holland v. Hodgson, where he again adverts to the same point.

Submitted by counsel that: "The case is governed by Ex parte Barclay, where Lord Justice Mellish said, that in the case of a mortgage of household property with fixtures, the test whether the mortgage required registration was whether power was given to the mortgagee to sever the fixtures from the premises, and to deal with them and sell them separately."

JAMES, L.J.—That is the test only where the question depends upon the language of the power of sale; not where there is a separate assignment of the fixtures.—p. 393.

Cooper v. Zeffert (1883) 32 W. R. 402.—C.A. BRETT, M.R.—It is being present and seeing a person do the thing which is attested. It is a fair and reasonable inference that when the deponent swears that Lewis attested it, he means to say that Lewis was present, and saw the execution which he attested. It was said that there are cases to the contrary. In Sharpe v. Birch there was no averment that the witness had attested, but only that his signature as a witness was in his own handwriting. In Ford v. Kettle, the affidavit only stated that the signature of the alleged attesting witnesses were in their proper handwritings. I cannot help thinking that what was stated by the late Master of the Rolls and Lindley, L.J., shows that, in their opinion, that if the affidavit had stated that which is stated in the one now in question, it would have been sufficient. Thus, Lindley, L.J. said: "He does not say that he saw the solicitor attest the execution." This affidavit positively states that, and therefore I think it is sufficient. In those cases the Court was extremely reluctant to give way to such objections, and I am not inclined myself to go further than they did. Therefore, the affidavit being sufficient, the bill was properly registered.—p. 402.

COTTON, L.J.—An affidavit has to be filed with the bill of sale when it is registered, and it is said that as the document which was filed, and which purports to be an affidavit, was sworn before a person about whom nothing is known but his name and his place of business, there being no statement that he was a commissioner for administering oaths, the affidavit cannot be accepted. In support of this contention Howard v. Brown was cited, in which it was held that where an affidavit did not state that it was sworn before a commissioner who was entitled to administer oaths, it could not be read. That was in some technical proceedings at common law, to which Lord Justice Bowen may perhaps refer, but I do not think I need, because fortunately we have another case which shows that, however that may be as to technical proceedings, yet in the present state of the law under the Bills of Sale Act, we can arrive at something like common sense. . . . Lord Justice Bowen has furnished me with another case [Cheney v. Curteis] actually under the Bills of Sale Act, 1854, where this very point was decided. There the affidavit was entitled in the Queen's Bench, but the person before whom it was sworn was stated to be a commissioner of the Exchequer, and the objection was taken that the affidavit was bad, because it was not stated in it that he was a commissioner of the Queen's Bench. The Court (composed of Erie, C.J., Williams, Willes and Keating, J.J.) overruled that objection. The question was put, "could the deponent be convicted of perjury if it is false?" and the Court said, "He can, if it is shown that the man before whom the oath was made was competent to administer an oath in these proceedings." That objection, a highly technical one, was overruled. In the absence of authority, I should have come to the same conclusion; but there being authority, I think the objection is answered by the decision which I have mentioned.—p. 345.

SMITH, L.J.—But it was argued that the sub-section [sub-sect. 3 of sect. 10 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878] relied on, only applied when the condition was one which prejudicially affected the donee, and that this was the opinion of James, L.J., in Ex parte Collins, on the construction of the Act. It is true that that case was not cited in Counsell v. London and Westminster Loan and Discount Co.; but in the last-mentioned case the C. A. held a condition to be within the Act which, I think, cannot be distinguished from the condition in the present case. When, therefore, I am faced with the difficulty of the judgment given by James and Mellish, L.J.J., I have, on the other hand, the decision of this Court, which came to the conclusion that a condition similar to that which we have in this case is within the meaning of the Act, and which judgment I prefer; and what is more, I have the decision of Cotton, L.J., in Carpenter v. Deane, in which that learned L.J. took no exception to the decision in Counsell's Case.

HUDDLESTON, B.—Mr. Muir has relied on the case of Pickard v. Marriage, but the facts in that case were very different, for however genuine the arrangement might have been that the goods should belong to the grantee, the arrangement was one which was not made known to the public.—p. 121.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—The business must be carried on bona fide, and the disposition and sale of the goods must be bona fide and in the ordinary course of such business. I am aware that those last words do not occur in the report of the National Mercantile Bank v. Hampson in the Law Reports, but the report of that case in the Weekly Reporter (28 W. R. 421) is more accurate, because in the pleadings which are not set out in the Weekly Reporter, but are in the Law Reports, there is a statement that Seaman, the grantor, sold the goods to the defendants, who bought them in the ordinary course of his business, and that it was the ordinary course of Seaman in such business to make such sales; and, therefore, when Lush, J. is reported, in the Weekly Reporter, to have said, "There must be an implied licence to sell where the person who gives the bill of sale sells in the ordinary course of his trade," I have no doubt the report is correct, for it follows the statement in the pleadings.—p. 565. CAVE, J.—In the first case [Witt v. Banner] . . .
 the description was altogether illusory, and was, no doubt, intended to include any pictures which might at any time be on the grantor's premises;
 for it is impossible to suppose that the grantor could have had in his possession exactly the same number of articles of each description mentioned in the schedule. Carpenter v. Deen is, no doubt, a case of some difficulty, and there

LOPES, L.J. differed from the other L.J.J. There the grantor was a dairyman, and the other L.J.J.
 drew the conclusion from that fact that it was intended to allow the grantee to seize any similar cows which at any hour might be on the grantor's premises. Here the state of things is quite different, for the grantor was a beer-house keeper and a carman, and it cannot be said that the goods were described in such a way that they could not possibly be identified. [They were described as "Roan horse, Drummer; brown mare and foal: three rade carts."]—p. 414.

ESHER, M.R.—If a lump sum for interest could be put into a bill of sale, the borrower would be borrowing money on a bill of sale without knowing the rate of interest which he is to pay. That, it seems to me, would be contrary to the form. The bill of sale must be made so plain that the borrower may have a fair opportunity of knowing what he is doing, not merely what sum, but what rate of interest he is to pay, so that if he is asked to pay 70 per cent. he may at least know what he is paying. . . . As at present advised, I am unable to agree with the decision in Thorpe v. Cregeen.—p. 285.

 to the other. . . . But in the present case the rate of interest is, in my opinion, sufficiently stated. The rate per month is given clearly, and the rate per annum can be easily calculated.

ESHER, M.R.—In this case it is admitted that the bill of sale is the same in terms as the bill of sale which was in question in Bianchi v. Offord. It is also admitted that there are words in this bill of sale in addition to the words in the bills of sale which were before the Court in Barber, In re, Stanford, Ex parte, and Goldstrom v. Tallerman; and if those added words are material, as I think they are, it is clear that Barber, In re, Stanford, Ex parte, and Goldstrom v. Tallerman do not govern this case. The only question, therefore, is, whether we are prepared to overrule Bianchi v. Offord. I am not prepared to overrule that case. There BOWEN, L.J. says: "It does not appear to me that in the case before us there was anything to show that the provision that the mortgagees might pay sums of money for rent, rates, taxes, and other outgoings, and that if the same were not repaid the goods might be immediately seized, was necessary to the maintenance of the security." There were, therefore, words in the bill of sale which were not in the form, and which could not be brought into the bill of sale under the direction in the form as to the insertion of terms which the parties may agree to for the maintenance of the security. The lord justice says: "I do not think that such further sums could be sums secured by the bill of sale within the meaning of sect. 7, sub-sect. 1." I am not prepared to overrule that decision.—p. 166.

ESHER, M.R.—But then it was said that according to Burdett, In re, you may divide the bill of sale into parts, and hold that it is in accordance with the form as to the chattels personal, striking out for this purpose the chattels real. Burdett, In re, however, is not an authority for that proposition. The question in that case was whether a bill of sale which comprised chattels personal and also a chattel real, and which was not in accordance with the statutory form, was valid as to the chattel real, and it was held that it was. Chattels real are not within the Act, and the provisions of sect. 9 as to the form of a bill of sale do not apply to them. That case, I think, was rightly decided, but it has nothing to do with a case like the present, where the dispute is as to chattels personal.—pp. 419, 420.

LOPES, L.J.—With regard to Goldstrom v. Tallerman, all I desire to say is that it is a different case to the present one, because here the sums to be paid exactly cover the amount of the interest, whereas in that case the periodical payments were larger than the periodical interest.—p. 204.

LOPES, L.J.—The scheduled form of a bill of sale, annexed to the Act of 1882, permits the introduction into the body of the bill of sale of "terms as to insurance, payment of rent, or otherwise, which the parties may agree to for the maintenance or defence of the security." Clauses, therefore, for the maintenance or defence of the security are unobjectionable and do not vitiate the bill of sale. In Consolidated Credit Corporation v. Gosney, a bill of sale was supported containing an agreement that the grantor should replace any chattels or things which should be worn out, with others of equal value, and in Furber v. Cobb an agreement by the grantor not to permit or suffer the chattels to be destroyed or injured, or to deteriorate in a greater degree than by reasonable wear and tear, and forthwith to replace, repair, and make good the same, was said to be in accordance with the form. . . . This bill of sale, therefore, does not sin against the statutable form unless the cases to which I have referred are altered or qualified by Thomas v. Kelly in the H. L. Consolidated Credit Co. v. Gosney is not cited in Thomas v. Kelly. If the bill of sale in Thomas v. Kelly is looked at, it will be found to be altogether different from the bill of sale in Consolidated Credit Co. v. Gosney. . . . Such terms [the terms of the bill of sale in Thomas v. Kelly] go far beyond any terms necessary for the maintenance or defence of the security.—pp. 388, 389.

WRIGHT, J.—Barr v. Kingsford was cited to show that the mere existence of a covenant to produce receipts on demand only avoided a bill of sale, on the ground that such a covenant to produce was not necessary for the security, as the Act only gives a power to seize on default of the production of the receipts on a demand in writing; but on looking at the judgment of Lord Coleridge more carefully it is clear that the grounds of the decision rested on the fact that the clause in the bill of sale empowering the grantee to seize was not limited to the extent of sect. 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, but was to operate on any breach of any of the covenants, one of which was to produce the receipts on demand. The Court held that, inasmuch as the only statutory power to seize was, inter alia, on failure to comply with such a demand when made in writing, it was contrary to the statute to add a provision for seizure for default of compliance with a mere demand. The bill of sale in that case was inconsistent with the statutory form inasmuch as there was to be power to seize in an event other than those mentioned in sect. 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.—pp. 507, 508.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—Ex parte Carter, on which Mr. Hemming relied, was a very different case from the present, though I think it right to say that, as at present advised, I am by no means satisfied that I should have agreed with the decision in that case.—p. 55.

JAMES, L.J.—In Ex parte National Mercantile Bank, the consideration was stated to be a loan of 2,050*l.* by the grantees to the grantor, and it was not the less a loan of that amount, because by a collateral agreement 550*l.* part of it was to be applied in the payment of a real bond vide debt from the grantor to the grantees existing at the time, and not arising out of the then transaction between the parties. For the present case there was really an evasion of the provisions of the Act, and it is not at all like Ex parte National Mercantile Bank.—p. 88.

LUSH, L.J.—In that case something was kept back by the grantee out of the nominal consideration as interest on the advance, though nothing could be then due for interest. In the present case there is nothing like fraud, and for the reasons which have been given by my learned colleagues, though my mind has fluctuated during the argument, I am now clearly of opinion that the provisions of the Act have been complied with, and that the consideration has been truly stated.—p. 269.

Haynes, In re, National Mercantile Bank, Ex parte (supra); and Rogers, In re, Challinor, Ex parte, explained.

Spindler, In re, Rolph, Ex parte (1881) 19 Ch. D. 98; 51 L. J. Ch. 88; 45 L. T. 482; 30 W. R. 52; 46 J. P. 181.—C.A. JESSEL, M.R., LUSH and LINDLEY, L.J.; reversing S. C. nom. Spindler, In re, Nicholson, Ex parte, 44 L. T. 828.—BACON, C.J.

JESSEL, M.R.—In Ex parte National Mercantile Bank, the money stated as the consideration was actually handed to the borrower in bank-notes and gold, and the question was whether that was the real consideration. The Court of Appeal held that it was the real consideration; that the money stated to have been paid to the borrower was actually paid to him, and that the bargain as to the application of the money was a merely collateral bargain. Whether they were right or wrong in that conclusion is immaterial; the question was one of fact, and, that being their conclusion of fact, they decided that there was nothing in the Act requiring that a collateral bargain should be stated in the deed. That case has no application to the present. Ex parte Challinor is no doubt more difficult to distinguish from the present case. But there, again, the question decided was really only one of fact. The lender, who was the borrower's solicitor, retained out of the sum stated as the consideration the expenses of preparing the deed and some costs which were due to him by the borrower for business previously transacted, and also a sum of 20*l.*, which he paid to an auctioneer for valuing the property. The Court came to the conclusion that the deduction was made in pursuance of a prior agreement that these sums should be paid out of the loan, and consequently the handing of the money to the borrower and the handing of it back by him to the lender was immaterial. This was a conclusion of fact. It only came to this, that if the consideration which was stated had been handed in notes and cash to the borrower, and then handed back by him, the consideration would have been truly stated in the deed, and would have been paid to him, and that the handing over of the money, and the handing of it back again, was a mere matter of form. Moreover, the sum retained was but small in proportion to the amount secured by the deed. I agree that the decision in Ex parte Challinor was right under the particular circumstances of the case. But neither of these cases, when carefully considered, supports the proposition that anything in the shape of a bona fide loan, of which the borrower gets the benefit, is sufficiently stated as the consideration for a bill of sale, if it is described as a cash payment.—p. 103.

Haynes, In re, National Mercantile Bank, Ex parte, and Rogers, In re, Challinor, Ex parte, explained.

Cowburn, In re, Frith, Ex parte (1882) 19 Ch. D. 419; 51 L. J. Ch. 473; 45 L. T. 120; 30 W. R. 529.—C.A. JESSEL, M.R., BRETT and HOLKER, L.J.

JESSEL, M.R.—That would finish what I have to say on this part of the case, were it not that our attention has been called, or rather re-called, to the two decisions of Ex parte National Mercantile Bank and Ex parte Challinor. Now I am quite satisfied to take these decisions as they are explained in Ex parte Challinor by Lord Justice James, who was then presiding in this Court. After stating what he thought the Act meant, he said (p. 266): "But when a man borrows money, he generally does so for the purpose of paying his debts, at any rate he ought to employ it in paying them; and if by his direction the money stated as the consideration is applied by the lender in the honest discharge of the borrower's debts, there is no reason for saying that that is not a payment of the money to him. That was the principle of our decision in Ex parte National Mercantile Bank, and in that case, besides the promissory notes of the borrower which were taken up, there were deducted some charges for the preparation of the security. It appears to me quite right to deduct the costs of preparing the bill of sale, and the auctioneer's charges for valuing the property, for that is what happens on every mortgage transaction." Then he goes on: "and it does not seem to me that the money was the less paid to the borrower because part of it was with his consent applied in payment of a debt for costs to his solicitor, which was not indeed strictly payable, because a bill of costs had not been delivered, but which was really owing to the solicitor." It is plain, therefore, that Lord Justice James, in dealing with this small sum for costs, thought it was a debt. He treats it on the principle that you can only apply the consideration in the payment of a debt. The fact that the costs of the preparation of the deed did not become a debt due from the grantee until after the transaction was completed, was not present to his mind, and all he intended to decide was, that a debt strictly so called, a debt existing at the time, might be deducted. I think that this reconciles the case with the subsequent decisions. But if it cannot be reconciled, all I can say is that, though I am bound by the decision in a precisely similar case, I do not feel inclined to extend it any further.—p. 428.

ESHER, M.R.—The consideration is stated to be 500*l.* paid by the assignee to the assignor on or immediately before the execution of the bill of sale. The meaning of that statement prima facie is, that the sum of 500*l.* was actually paid, which clearly was not the case. If the sum in question had been actually paid over to the assignor without any binding undertaking by him to pay any part of it back, as appears to have been the case in National Mercantile Bank, Ex parte, I think the consideration would have been in strictness accurately stated, although the assignor had chosen voluntarily to pay part of it back again in respect of some other debt either due or becoming payable in the future.—p. 272.

WESTBURY, L.C.—Some use was made at the bar and in the Court below of the language attributed to Parke, B., in the case of Mogg v. Baker. The learned judge appears to have given, not his own opinion, but what he understood would have been the decision of a Court of equity upon the case. He is represented as speaking upon the authority of one of the judges of the Court of Chancery. Any communication so made was of course extra-judicial, and there is much danger in making communications of such a nature the ground of judicial decision; but I entirely concur in what appears to have been the principle intended to be stated; for Parke, B., speaking of the agreement, says: "It would cover no specific furniture and would confer no right in equity." I have already explained that a contract relating to goods, but not to any specific goods, would not be the subject of a decree for specific performance, and that a contract that could not be specifically performed would not avail to transfer any estate or interest. If, therefore, the contract in Mogg v. Baker related to no specific furniture, it is true that it would not, at the time of its execution, confer any right in equity; but it is equally true that it would attach on furniture answering the contract when acquired, provided the contract remained in force at the time of such acquisition.—p. 212.

Talby v. Official Receiver (supra), in H.L.
LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The contention of the learned counsel for the respondent was this: They asserted as a proposition of law that an assignment of future book debts not limited to any specified business is too vague to have any effect. . . . The origin of the doctrine, modern though it be, is lost in obscurity. Before Holroyd v. Marshall (32 L. J. C. P. 258; 14 C. B. (S.S.) 566) no support for it can be found. Possibly it may be evolved from Holroyd v. Marshall. LOPES, L.J. seems to think so. It assumed a definite form in Belding v. Read. It was recognised by FRY, J. in D'Epineuil, In re, and it received the stamp of authority from what was said or implied by two of the learned judges who decided Clements v. Matthews. No other authority or semblance of authority was produced. I have read Holroyd v. Marshall many times, and I can discover no trace of the doctrine there. Belding v. Read, as BOWEN, L.J. points out, was founded upon a misapprehension of Lord Westbury's judgment in Holroyd v. Marshall. In D'Epineuil, In re, the learned judge, as he stated in Clarke, In re, thought himself bound by Belding v. Read, and simply followed the decision in that case. As for the order made in D'Epineuil, In re, it seems to me to have been only too favourable to the claimant. I much doubt whether a memorandum like that on which the claimant relied, could create a specific lien of any sort or kind. Finally, COTTON, L.J. has himself disclaimed the hidden meaning attributed to his judgment in Clements v. Matthews. . . . I need hardly say that I think the decision in Clarke, In re, unquestionably correct; and I should say nothing more about it, but that I find that some of the learned judges have drawn a distinction which I confess I am unable to appreciate. It was said that both in Clements v. Matthews and in Clarke, In re, the contract was divisible, but that in the present case the contract is indivisible. The contract is not, I think, divisible in the usual acceptance of the word. . . . To say that an assignment by a trader of all future book debts in his present business, and also of all future book debts in any other business which he may hereafter undertake, is divisible, but that an assignment of all his future book debts is not divisible, seems to me to be attributing substance and reality to the merest verbal distinction.—pp. 84, 85, 88.

Cooper v. Zeffert (1883) 32 W. R. 402.—C.A.
BRETT, M.R.—But it was said that the first bill of sale was cancelled by the second. The second was given to confirm what had been done by the first, so that the real intention was that, if the first was insufficient, it could be confirmed, but that, if it was sufficient, it should stand. There was no intention to do away with the legal effect of the first, if it had a legal effect. It was said that the case, Smale v. Burr, decides that, notwithstanding the intentions of the parties, the giving of the second bill of sale cancels the first, on the ground, as I understand it, that the grantee can only take the second bill of sale upon the theory that the grantor had taken back the property in the goods in order to grant the second bill of sale. That would be so if the intention of the parties was to do away with the first in order to make the second valid. In that case the parties were trying to evade the statute as to renewal of bills of sale, and to avoid registration, and therefore they gave successive bills of sale within the time when registration was to be made. The intention there was that the first bill of sale should be got rid of, so that it should not have to be registered, and that the second should be valid. Therefore the Court held that the last bill of sale was valid, and that it cancelled the first, because that was the obvious intention of the parties. Here it is obvious that the intention of the parties was exactly contrary, and that the second bill of sale was, in the circumstances, taken without any intention to cancel the first.—p. 402.

JESSEL, M.R.—I give no opinion on the position in Richards v. James as to the effect of an execution on an unregistered bill of sale. I am not prepared to say that it avoids it altogether. Suppose a bill of sale, given for 1,000*l.* and not registered, and then a judgment creditor for 10*l.* takes out execution and seizes the goods while still in the possession of the debtor. The execution is good against the bill of sale, but I am disposed to think that the holder of the bill of sale can claim the residue.—p. 512.

FRY, L.J. (during the argument).—In that case the first bill of sale was an absolute assignment of the goods. Here the grantor had an equity of redemption. The Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10, recognises the fact that there may be several bills of sale of the same chattels, and regulates their priority.—pp. 409, 410.

LINDLEY, L.J.—But what is the position of a man who gives a bill of sale, not by way of absolute assignment, as in Tuck v. Southern Counties Deposit Bank, but by way of mortgage to secure an advance? He still has the equity of redemption in the goods. What is there to show that he is not the true owner to the extent of that interest for the purpose of giving a fresh bill of sale as security for a further advance of money? It would be going too far to stretch the language of the section to make that impossible. I certainly am not prepared for the first time to put such an interpretation on the statute as would prevent a man from giving a second bill of sale on the same goods.—p. 412.

LINDLEY, M.R.—Agreeing as I do with Romer, J., and with the judgments which my brothers have prepared and which I have read, I should say nothing more if it were not that I think I ought to express my dissent from the observations of Fry, L.J., on which the appellants base their contention. The decision of the Court in Wentlock (Baroness) v. River Dye Co. was quite right, and the judgment in it is very valuable. Fry, L.J., who delivered it, was the last person to shut his eyes and not get at the real facts and substance of any case before him. But in dealing with that case, the L.J. says that "the Court closes its eyes to the true facts of the case." I cannot help thinking that this is incorrect. A prohibition against borrowing more than a given sum is only in reality and substance disobeyed when an obligation to pay more than that sum is contracted. Courts of equity have always looked into the facts to see whether the prohibition has been really disobeyed or not. If it is disobeyed, and to the extent to which it is disobeyed, the prohibition is enforced . . . so far as such money has been applied in discharging debts or liabilities which could be enforced against the company, the prohibition against borrowing does not apply to it, and the Courts have so decided. The subrogation theory has been had recourse to in order to account for the decisions ultimately arrived at; but the theory was really not wanted in order to justify them. It was, however, adequate for the purposes for which it was used, and as applied to the cases before the Courts it led to just results.

SELBORNE, L.C.—The V.-C. of the Duchy of Lancaster and the C. A. considered it to have been settled, by authorities which they ought to follow, that any rule of such a society formed under the Act of 6 & 7 Will. 4, by which borrowing money without some limit of amount was authorised, was repugnant to, and inconsistent with, the provisions of that statute, and therefore incapable of being made legal by any consent of members or allowance of the certifying barrister. But when the authorities which were supposed to establish this proposition are referred to, none of them are found to be really decisions upon that point: they all seem to depend upon a dictum of Lord Hatherley in Laing v. Reed, to the effect that although a limited borrowing power, if expressly given by a rule duly certified, would be good (as was decided in that case), a rule authorising the trustees "to raise an unlimited sum of money wholly regardless of the contributions which might be made by the members," would be "contrary to the intent and scope of the Act." I am not sure in what sense these words, "wholly regardless of the contributions," &c., were meant by Lord Hatherley to be understood; but I subscribe to the doctrine laid down in the same case by Giffard, L.J., that the test ought to be whether the rule (not being contrary to any express prohibition in the statute) was one which made the society "a thing different from a benefit building society." If not, and if it "merely provided a method of conducting business" (i.e., the proper business of a benefit building society), it could not be illegal or ultra vires; being made by the proper authority, and certified in the proper manner. Without disparagement to the weight justly due to those learned judges, who in several later cases have referred, with apparent approval and concurrence, to Lord Hatherley's dictum, I think that in this state of authority the point cannot be regarded as settled; and that your lordships ought to decide it according to your own view of the true effect of the statute.—p. 536.

LORD BLACKBURN.—What is here decided [National Building Society, In re] is that a society under this Act has no power to borrow unless its rules authorise it so to do, and that is, I think, as well as settled to be law as anything not yet decided by this House can be. I do not think that the actual decision in Laing v. Reed ought to be put higher than that a rule which authorised borrowing, but was so expressed as on its construction not to make the members as such liable for the money borrowed, and which also had a limit as to the sums to be borrowed, was valid. It left it open to any one to say that had not both these limits existed, non constat that the decision would not have been different. And I think also that the language of Lord Hatherley is such that it might fairly be argued that Lord Hatherley attached weight to the limit as to amount contained in the 5th subsection of the rule (p. 552). . . . Malins, V.-C. [Victoria Building Society, In re] assumes, without giving any reasons for it, that a rule giving a power to borrow, if valid at all, must give a power, so as to enable those who borrowed to pledge the credit of the members as individuals. Whether a rule which authorised the managers to pledge the members as individuals was ever certified or not I do not know; it certainly would be eminently inexpedient that there should be such a power. Whether, if such a rule existed, it would be valid is a question which has never, as far as I can find, been raised; it certainly was not raised in Laing v. Reed. . . . I am by no means prepared to decide that question either way until it arises, which it . . . does not in the present case (p. 554). . . . The language of James, L.J. [Professional Commercial and Industrial Building Society, In re] has been cited as showing that he was under the impression that Laing v. Reed was to be understood in the limited sense put upon it by Malins, V.-C., in Hill's Case. . . . Now, though James, L.J., had not any need to decide this, and may not have put his mind to the point, he does, I think, intimate that his impression was that the rule, not limiting the amount of money to be borrowed, was, according to Laing v. Reed, not valid. I have already expressed my reasons for coming to a different conclusion, but I think James, L.J.'s expressions are an authority against me. But I do not think I can, in any possible view of it, be held to settle the law.—p. 554, 555.

LORD WATSON.—An examination of these cases, all of which have been already noticed by . . . Lord Blackburn, satisfies me that in none of them was the present question as to the validity or invalidity of that which has been termed an unlimited power to borrow raised and decided. The doctrine that such a power is ultra vires of the society, and therefore void, had its origin in the opinion expressed by Lord Hatherley in Laing v. Reed, an opinion which was referred to as authoritative in subsequent cases, although the point did not there arise for judicial determination. In Laing v. Reed, the sum authorised to be borrowed was restricted to two-thirds of the total amount for the time being secured to the society, by mortgage, so that there was no question before the Court as to the legality of an unlimited power. But it certainly appears to me that Lord Hatherley in that case sustained the power on the express ground that it was limited as to amount, and that the limit was proportioned to that part of its contributed capital, which the society had advanced to its members or lent on mortgage; and I think the noble and learned lord did intend to lay down the law to that effect, that without some limitation of that character the power would have been invalid. I prefer the test of its legality applied by Giffard, L.J., to the rule which he had to consider along with Lord Hatherley in Laing v. Reed.—“Does this rule merely provide a method of conducting business? Or is it a rule making the society a thing different from a benefit building society?”—p. 557.

LORD BLACKBURN.—It was argued that in Blackburn and District Building Society (post, col. 273) the C. A. had decided that payments to withdrawing members were, or at least might be, liabilities of the society. I understand that this case is now under appeal—and if that is so, I would avoid prejudicing that appeal by expressing or even forming any opinion, unless it was required for the decision of the case now before the House. It appears from the account taken that even if all the payments to withdrawing members were allowed, the balance on the account would remain very much against the appellants. It is, therefore, as it seems to me, not necessary to form any opinion on this point.—p. 381.

LORD WATSON.—The House had occasion in a recent case [Guardian Society, In re, Agnew v. Murray] to consider the provisions of 6 & 7 Will. 4, with reference to the question of borrowing powers; and I understood the noble and learned lords who decided that case to be of opinion that, whilst these provisions did not preclude the members of a benefit building society from authorising their managers to borrow for the legitimate purposes of the society's business, the managers could have no such authority unless it were given them by the rules.—p. 382. (for the Court, BRETT, M.R., COTTON and LINDLEY, L.J.J.).—The bankers, though dealing with the directors in matters which were not within the authority of the directors, were not acting fraudulently. Guardian Building Society, In re, was not in point. The money there in question was secured by mortgage on property of the society. The mortgagees here were on the property, not of the society, but of its members, and the society acquired their interest in the property by means of the money lent by the bankers.—p. 1096.

Reed* had decided that, under a limited borrowing power, a building society was entitled to borrow; and, curiously enough, the rule of the society in that case was expressed in very much the same language as that of the section (sect. 15), namely, “the amount for the time being secured by the mortgages to the society.” And Lord Hatherley, in the course of his judgment, translates this term into “the amount that may be outstanding upon mortgages.” I do not found my decision on this dictum; but, following it, I decide this case unfavourably to the plaintiffs. . . . Matterson v. Elderfield decided that a society is entitled to take at once the whole amount of the future instalments due, without allowing any discount whatever. . . . The second question arises in working out the equity of the person who has lent to the society sums in excess of their borrowing power. Such sums, it is clear, he cannot recover; but it is also established that he has an equity of subrogation which is expressed by Lord Selborne in Blackburn Building Society v. Cunliffe Brooks & Co. (supra, col. 260), as the right to be repaid such portion of the amount lent as went to pay the legitimate debts of the society. To this extent the lender is entitled to stand in the shoes of the creditors. . . . In Blackburn Building Society v. Cawcliffe Brooks & Co. (54 L. J. Ch. 1091), the V.-C. of the Duchy of Lancaster gave the bankers the benefit of all sums received by the society from advanced members by way of bonus, &c., subject, however, to the costs of the winding up, and to mortgages and charges to the society in respect of advances out of its proper funds. This limitation was, however, struck out by the C. A. It is true the exact point as to the bonus does not appear to have been argued before them; but the ground on which they proceeded is stated to be that, "We treat the mortgages given to secure sums lent out of money advanced by the bankers as property which they are entitled to claim, that is, as their property"—that is to say, the security given by the advanced member is to be treated as the property of the quasi lender.—pp. 6, 7.

CAMPBELL, L.C.—The decision appealed against is, ipsa iuris verbis, as in Fleming v. Self—is on the same rules—and is made under the same circumstances. I must suppose that the question about double payment of redemption money was brought under the consideration of the Court by counsel in that case; and was present to the mind of Lord Cranworth, who, after a long and careful consideration of every item of charge and credit, pronounced the decree. There can be little doubt that the decree has been acted upon since by societies of this description. The fair inference is that it has been consequently acting down the law upon these loan building societies, and that it has been consequently acted upon. It may fairly be supposed that various transactions, by borrowing shareholders and others, have been settled on the foundation of that decision, and we ought, in my opinion at least, to consider ourselves bound by the terms of it. It is a decision which we ought not to disturb.—p. 134. KNIGHT BRUCE and TURNER, L.J.J. concurred.

COTTON, L.J.—When we look at the facts of that case we find that all that was decided there was, that though the mortgage debt was so far gone that the shareholder was able to redeem his property, yet he still remained liable for payments in respect of shares still subsisting. But here all which was payable down to the time when the mortgage was satisfied is covered by the receipt, and there is no claim for payments accrued due since, but for sums due before the mortgage was vacated. Therefore that decision has no bearing on the present case.—p. 286. BOWEN and FRY, L.J.J. concurred.

LINDLEY, L.J.—When we look at the Irish case of Ulster Permanent Building Society v. Glenton, which appears to be an authority that an assignment is valid, I am struck by the observations of the learned judge, who treated the mortgagor as consenting and as bringing the whole thing about. Of course, if a mortgagor consents, there is no difficulty. I do not go so far as to say without further consideration that a mortgage debt owing to a building society cannot be assigned without the consent of the mortgagor. All I say is, that it is a matter which appears to be fraught with difficulty, and will require a great deal of consideration before it is held that it can be assigned. Of course, I mean to a stranger who has nothing to do with the rules of the society and cannot give the mortgagor the benefit which the building society can. I will, therefore, do what Stirling, J. did, pass the question by, and then consider whether, if the debt was validly assigned, Mr. Rumney, the assignee, has power to sell. It appears from authorities which are plain that he has not.—p. 642. LOPES and CHITTY, L.JJ. concurred.

NORTH, J.—No doubt statutory receipts under the Act of Parliament relating to building societies have been decided to have certain legal effects, and I need hardly say that if these decisions applied to the present case I should follow Pease v. Jackson and Robinson v. Trevor. But in the present case there is no such receipt. There is what is called a statutory reconveyance, but that does not take effect under the Friendly Societies Act; and although the reconveyance does in the body of the deed contain a receipt, it is not executed in the way in which the Act requires that such a receipt should be executed in order to give it any peculiar statutory efficacy in transferring the legal estate.—p. 400.

HALSBURY, L.C.—The C. A. considered themselves bound by the authority of Pease v. Jackson. . . . I believe the true solution of the concluding words in Lord Cairns' judgment in Pease v. Jackson is, that it was some trifling sum, the consideration of which was quite outside the questions really argued before him, and which he summarily disposed of without meaning to lay down any principle at all. Sir G. Jessel, who was counsel in the case, protested that the question was never argued. At all events, the universal consensus of judicial opinion has, I believe, ever since that time refused to acquiesce in the soundness of that judgment—if it can be called a judgment—though bowing to the authority of the Court that decided it. Your lordships, however, are free to pronounce a decision upon it; and, as it does not rest upon anything but the words so uttered at the end of a judgment dealing with the other and more important part of the argument, I think your lordships will do well to consider rather the current of judicial authority than the single opinion so given, and to overrule the judgment so far as that part of the judgment is concerned.—p. 368.

LORD WATSON.—The circumstances which gave rise to controversy in Pease v. Jackson were very similar to those which occur in the present case. The third mortgagee, who had no notice of the second charge, advanced 230*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*, of which 223*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* was applied in payment of the first mortgage, held by a building society, who, on receiving the money, indorsed a receipt on their mortgage, and handed it to him, along with the titles of the property. The M.R. (Lord Romilly) held that the original mortgage was vacated by the 5th section of the Building Societies Act of 1836; and that the third charge in point of date was an entirely new mortgage, which must be postponed to the second of the original securities. The L.C. reversed his judgment, and preferred the last mortgagee to the extent of 223*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.*, but postponed the balance, which only amounted to 7*l.* 3*s.*, to the incumbrance of the second mortgagee. The case turned, as the present does, upon the construction of sect. 5 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, which makes it lawful for the trustees of a building society to indorse upon their mortgage a receipt for the moneys thereby secured, "which shall be sufficient to vacate the same, and vest the estate . . . in the person or persons for the time being entitled to the equity of redemption. . . . There is, no doubt, some obscurity in the words "person or persons for the time being entitled to the equity of redemption." Earl Cairns points out, in Pease v. Jackson, the two constructions of which he thought they were susceptible. . . . Of the two possible constructions propounded by the noble and learned lord, I prefer the second. I think the legislature, by the expression "person or persons entitled to the equity of redemption" meant to indicate that there might be persons other than the mortgagor who would be so entitled, and that its true interpretation must be reached, in cases like the present, by holding that the expression refers to the person or persons who, at the time of the indorsement, have the better equity to call for the legal estate. The appellants are admittedly in that position, so far as they stand in the place of the three societies who were originally first mortgagees; but Pease v. Jackson is a direct decision to the effect that, although the legal estate is now vested in them in respect of that part of their mortgage debt, they have no priority in respect of the remainder. All that Earl Cairns says with regard to the small balance of 7*l.* 3*s.* is, "the defendants will, however, only be entitled to be redeemed for the amount advanced by them to the Middlesbrough society (that is, to the original mortgagees); as to any charge beyond that, the Leeds society will be incumbrancers pro tanto to the plaintiffs, and there will be an ultimate decree of foreclosure against them for that amount." For that conclusion the noble and learned lord assigns no reasons; and I am disposed to think that he had not considered the point. In Marron v. Cox (supra) the late M.R., who was one of the counsel engaged in Pease v. Jackson, strongly disapproved of that part of the decision, and stated expressly that the point was not argued. The decision in Pease v. Jackson has nevertheless been followed by the C. A. in Robinson v. Trevor and in the present case; but none of the learned judges who constituted the Court on these occasions have expressed their approval of it; whilst Lindley, L.J., in this case, referred to the opinion of Sir G. Jessel in Marron v. Cox as one "which, in point of reason, I am bound to say would commend itself to my mind." I am unable to agree with the decision in Pease v. Jackson in so far as it relates to the balance of the moneys advanced against the new mortgage which was not expended in paying off the original incumbrances, because it appears to me to be at variance with the true intendment of the 5th section of the Act of Will. 4, and the ordinary principles which govern the priority of mortgage debts.—pp. 369—371.

LORD FITZGERALD.—It is to be observed, too, that in Robinson v. Trevor the M.R. and Bowen, L.J., accept the conclusion arrived at by Baggallay, L.J., only on the ground that they feel bound by Pease v. Jackson. That decision is now so far overruled.—p. 372.

French v. Municipal Permanent Building Society (1884) 53 L. J. Ch. 743; 50 L. T. 567.

PEARSON, J.—The material difference between those cases and the one now before me is very great indeed. In those cases there had been mortgages by members to their societies, and the question raised in the actions was a money question—namely, as to whether the societies had been paid what was owing to them, or whether there had been an over-payment. In those cases it has now been decided, and in the latter of them by the H. L., that under the Building Societies Act, 1874, there is power under the arbitration clause to deal with all such questions by arbitration, and that an agreement to refer disputes to arbitration is consequently binding upon members. It was found that there were certain blots in the earlier Acts by reason of which an arbitrator had not the requisite power; but those imperfections were removed by the Act of 1874, and the requisite power now exists. But this case is quite different. Here the plaintiffs, being members of the society, executed a mortgage to the society, and the latter, under their powers of sale, either as conferred by the deed or under their own rules, sold or purported to sell the mortgaged property to Dickenson. He happens to be a member of the society; but without expressing any definite opinion, I confess that I am at present unable to see how the fact of Dickenson being a purchaser, independently of his being a member, can operate to constitute him anything different from a stranger to the society for the purposes of the transaction in question.—p. 744.

HERSCHELL, L.C.—This case turns upon the true construction of sect. 2 of the Building Societies Act, 1884. There is no doubt that, but for that section, this action was properly stayed upon the authority of the Municipal Permanent Building Society v. Kent, and the question is, whether an alteration has been made by the section in question, so that the plaintiffs are to be no longer restrained from pursuing their remedy at law. Now the section is not easy to construe, because difficulties may be suggested whatever view is taken of its construction. It is necessary, therefore, to look carefully at what was the state of the law at the time the Building Societies Act, 1884, was passed. Now, in Municipal Permanent Building Society v. Kent, the question arose whether a building society could sue one of its members at law in order to enforce its remedies under a mortgage deed given by the member, or whether the society was limited to the remedy by arbitration, and a majority in the H. L. held that the society was limited to the remedy by arbitration. The rule of the building society providing for the settlement by arbitration of disputes between the society and any of its members, or their legal representatives, was held to be extended to all liabilities between the society and its members, and therefore to apply to liabilities under mortgage. Lord Selborne differed from the majority in the H. L., and he was of opinion that the rule did not extend to disputes arising under a mortgage deed. He thought that the rule related to "disputes under the rules between members (in that character) or their representatives, in respect of their rights or liabilities as such, and the society, and not to questions arising out of covenants, or special stipulations in deeds executed between members and the society, and embodying contracts collateral and additional to the social contract, though of a nature contemplated and authorised by it; nor to any questions between the society as mortgagee and one of its members as mortgagor, with reference to the legal consequences of, or rights and liabilities resulting from, the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee." I may observe in passing, that the same redundancy in the language of the section is to be found in the language I have just quoted, because Lord Selborne, after saying, "and not to questions arising under covenants, &c., in deeds executed between members and the society, and embodying contracts collateral and additional to the social contract," goes on to say, "nor to any questions between the society as mortgagee and one of its members as mortgagor, &c.," which would seem to limit rather than extend the whole proceeding. In that state of things, sect. 2 of the Building Societies Act, 1884, was passed, which purported to limit the meaning of "disputes," and intended to limit the meaning in some way. It appears to me that the judges below have not given sufficient weight to that fact. Considering the language I have read and the language of the first part of the section, I think the section was framed to give to the rules of building societies the meaning put upon them by Lord Selborne in the H. L.—p. 387.

COTTON, L.J.—There are cases exactly in point on the present question. In Armitage v. Walker a person in exactly the same position as the present plaintiff was held bound by the rules to refer disputes between him and the society to arbitration. It is contended that that decision has been practically overruled by later decisions, but the only later decision really relied upon was Auld v. Glasgow Working Men's Building Society, which was said to establish this proposition, that the plaintiff, having given notice to withdraw, was a creditor outside the rules of the society. That case decided nothing of the kind. The plaintiff, as a member, had entered into a contract with the society, and certain members of the society, the majority at a meeting, had tried to alter the contract into which he as a member had entered with the society. It was held that he was not bound by that; and that, therefore, as a member, he was entitled to insist upon his rights under the contract originally entered into by him with the society; but it in no way laid down that he was to be treated not as a member but as a creditor. Then there is Wright v. Jeeley, where apparently the very point was decided, and in my opinion rightly decided.—p. 784.

SELBORNE, L.C.—Now, with regard to the authorities, there are only three which seem to me to be at all in point; and of those, with regard to the one which is, as far as it goes, adverse to the case of the appellant—namely, the case of the Norwich Society—I think it is quite true that some differences have been pointed out. . . . I agree that that is a distinct difference, that a total withdrawal from the society was contemplated in the Norwich Case, while here it is at least not manifest that that was contemplated. I think that it was not necessary. Some cases have been pointed out where that did not happen. That is a distinction not without importance, but I think that it is not of sufficient importance to prevent the case, as far as it goes, bearing against the argument for the appellant, because that case at least shows that there is nothing inconsistent either with the nature of the contract contained in rules of this description, or with the effect in point of law of a winding-up order, in the proposition that a withdrawing member, if entitled under the rule, may stand as a quasi creditor against the funds when all other creditors have been paid. I do not think that the distinction turning upon the grant of a certificate by the directors, or upon a subsequent express allowance of 3 per cent. interest, is very material. About interest there may be a question, but that is not necessary for the decision, whether it would be due or not; still, if the construction of the rule is what I take it to be, the result would, I think, be the same. The case of the Mutual Society, in my judgment, as in the judgment of all the judges in the C.A., depended upon a particular rule, which they construed, which I construe, and which I think the late Sir G. Jessel construed, as providing for the constitution of a special and definite fund out of which alone withdrawing members were to be paid in a manner which was inapplicable to the state of things existing after the winding up. Therefore the case of the Mutual Society has no application. And with regard to Cantliffe Brothers & Co v. Blackburn Building Society (supra, col. 263), that case stood thus: The question was between bankers who held deeds of the society against which advances had been made and the official liquidator; the official liquidator not representing one class of members alone nor the members alone, but representing all the contributors and also the creditors; and unless the bankers had a right to hold as against all creditors and all contributors they failed in their case. . . . It is not necessary for me to express any opinion as to whether the principle on which the bankers were allowed to stand in the place of actual creditors entitled to immediate payment, and who were paid with their money, would have been applicable to such a claim to stand in the place of withdrawing members against an eventual surplus. It is enough to say that nothing was decided in the C.A., any more than in this House, which had the slightest bearing upon any such question.—p. 365.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I think that the late M.R., in Mutual Society, In re, did determine, upon the special rules of the society in that case, that it was not such a matter as I have described, an absolute promise to pay, but only a promise to pay out of a particular fund, which particular fund was destroyed at the time; and I think that no one who reads the rule which is quoted at the bottom of the page can fail to see that it was so, and that Sir G. Jessel was perfectly right in what he decided.—p. 368.

BOWEN, L.J.—The question we have really to answer in the present instance is whether the rights which accrue under art. 54, upon the notice of withdrawal of members who wish to withdraw, are rights which obtain after the winding up or after the closing of the fund referred to in arts. 53 and 56. . . . I think that under arts. 55 and 56, the closing of the fund is a closing which in no way affects the rights of the withdrawing members to look to this source for payment. . . . It seems to me that that train of reasoning is in accordance with the train of reasoning laid down by the C.A. in the Blackburn Case, which was affirmed by the H. L., although I repeat what I said at the beginning of my judgment—namely, that this is a pure question of construction of this particular society, and no more. For the same reason it seems to me that the true answer to the argument sought to be drawn from the Mutual Society Case and the decision of the late M.R. in that case, is that it was decided upon the rules of another society, which are not the same rules as the present. I do not think there is any principle of construction at all to be derived from that case which applies to the present: but if any principle of construction is to be derived from that case which is different from that which I have expressed, I entirely concur with what Baggallay, L.J. has said; and I should differ from the M.R. because I must say I prefer my own construction to his.—pp. 547, 548.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is quite obvious when you look at the Act and the rules which the Court had to deal with [Sheffield and South Yorkshire Building Society, In re], that a man who had given notice of withdrawal, even if he had not been paid out, was not liable to contribute anything under the rules of that Society. . . . Nothing can be due from him, after his notice of withdrawal, whether he has received his money out or not: he has nothing more to contribute. Therefore it is perfectly plain that the decision in the Sheffield Case was right. But there are some expressions in that case which look as if the Court treated members who had given notice of withdrawal as no longer members of the society. That is to be explained by the circumstance that, in that particular case, the members there had been paid out, and therefore they had ceased to be members of the society. They had nothing whatever to do with it. . . . the decision . . . has nothing to do with this case one way or the other. The only other case which is at all important is Walker v. General Mutual Building Society (supra, col. 272) which, so far as it goes, is in accordance with the view which we are now taking of the Act—that is to say, that a member who has given notice of withdrawal, but is not paid out, is still a member.—pp. 372—373.

HERSCHEL, L.C.—There appears to me, therefore, to be no substantial distinction between the rules of this society and the rules of the society in Brownlie's Case, and I think, therefore the determination in Brownlie's Case determines the present case also. In Brownlie's Case it was held that after a winding up an advanced member could not take advantage of the rule enabling him to withdraw, because his right to act under that rule ceased by reason of the order for winding up; but it was held that the winding-up order created a kind of compulsory withdrawal of all the members who were at that time advanced members of the society, and compelled them to repay the amount which was still due upon their advances, but did not substantially alter their position or their rights or render them at all different from what they would have been if they had been withdrawing under the rules.—p. 503.

MATHEW, J. (for the Court, COLERIDGE, C.J. and MATHEW, J.).—Brownlie v. Russell . . . is only material for the reasons given for the view that the right to withdraw does not survive a winding-up order. As appears from the judgment of the L.C., a winding-up order takes away the right, because it necessarily puts a close to the whole concern, terminates at the date the account of each shareholder, and cuts off all chance of profit which, if the thing had gone on, both classes of members might have had. But all these consequences were as clear and as inevitable in the case of these societies when the report of the accountant was published in February, 1887, as if a winding-up order had then been actually made. Walton v. Edge was relied upon by the learned counsel for the appellants as an authority for the proposition that members who gave effective notices before the date of the winding-up order were entitled to priority in payment to those members who had not given notice. But the question in that case was as to the rights of members who gave notice not only before there was any winding up, but when there was no information that any winding up was going to take place, and when nothing special was alleged to affect them with notice that the society was not to continue as a going concern. The view we take is in accordance with the valuable judgment of Lord Shand in Carriek v. North British Building Society. It is not the order to wind up, but the state of things which to the knowledge of all concerned renders liquidation inevitable, that in such a case as this puts an end to the right to withdraw.—p. 225. And see post, col. 279.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—The society has dissolved and has paid all its outside creditors in full, and there is a surplus left; and the question is as to the priorities of their non-borrowing members inter se. . . . The cases which have been cited to me form a continuous and uninterrupted current of authority, no one of them in any way contradicting or conflicting with the others. The last . . . is . . . Barnard v. Tomson. I do not propose to go into the facts of that case at any length, because, when one comes to look at the judgment of North, J., he is really only recognising and carrying out the principles that were laid down . . . in Sunderland Universal Building Society, In re. It will be seen that his judgment is to the effect that the view he takes is that the line ought to be drawn at the time when there has either happened a stoppage of business or a recognition of the fact that business must be stopped. . . . There had not been a stoppage; and as to recognition by the officers of the fact that there must be a stoppage, they, although they considered the financial position of the society sufficiently grave, after they had considered the question, in the result reported against an immediate dissolution. North, J., in saying that, follows . . . Sunderland Universal Building Society, In re. . . . There has been a great deal of argument before me as to what is the meaning of that judgment. In particular a question has been raised, and necessarily was raised, as to what they meant when they spoke of the society being known to be insolvent, or when they spoke of the society being no longer able to carry on its business. The words are "notorious that the society could not meet its liabilities." I do not think that the judges had the slightest intention in this portion of their judgment of defining what were the conditions, the happening of which would bring to an end the right of withdrawal; and all that they meant to do by their judgment was to say that in the particular case before them these conditions were present—that there was in fact a society unable to carry on its business, and that it had become notorious that the society could not meet its liabilities. I do not understand them to lay down any such rule as that the right to withdraw is dependent on either the knowledge of the person giving notice of withdrawal or of the officers of the society that the society is in an insolvent condition. I only understand them to say that the conditions were present in that case, and those conditions being present the society must be considered as having stopped business, or resolved to stop business, at that date which they are there dealing with. . . . That is my understanding of what the judges meant by their judgment; and when I look at Walton v. Edge . . . and Carrick v. North British Building Society, the cases on which Coleridge, C.J. and Mathew, J. say their judgment is based, I find in them both that the real question propounded by the judges to themselves in those cases was—Had there been a stoppage of business, or anything that was equivalent to a stoppage of business? and they held that whenever there had been a stoppage of business or anything equivalent to it the right of withdrawal was determined. But it does not seem to me that insolvency, or even insolvency known to the officers of the society, is equivalent to a stoppage of business: and I propose to deal with the present case on that basis.—pp. 117–119. And see post.

LINDLEY, L.J.—If a man borrows money and stipulates to repay it by instalments, the majority of the members of his society would obviously have no right, under any intelligible principle of law, to compel him to pay up the whole sum straight off. If they have any such right, it must be given by statutory enactments. It is said that, if this were a winding up under the Companies Act, 1862, a borrowing member could be compelled to do so, and that the Court did this in Brownlie v. Russell. I do not think that that case went so far; but if it did, the matter has been set right by the recent Act [of 1894]. Sect. 32 of the Act of 1874 draws a distinction between dissolution and winding up. But what we are dealing with is a dissolution, and not a winding up. It appears to me that there was some misapprehension as to the point decided in Brownlie v. Russell.—p. 61.

Kemp v. Wright, considered.

STIRLING, J.—It is, however, contended that any rights of the plaintiff are put an end to by the instrument of dissolution. In support of this proposition Kemp v. Wright, before Kekewich, J., is relied on. That case decided several points. . . . The judgment of Kekewich, J. appears to be based on two propositions—first, that what was done in Kemp v. Wright could have been validly done by an alteration of the rules; and secondly, that, this being so, it could be done with equal efficacy by an instrument of dissolution under sect. 32 of the Benefit Building Societies Act, 1874. In principle these propositions cover the present case; and if the matter had rested there, I should have thought it right to follow the decision, even though I might have doubted whether I should myself have arrived at the same conclusion. . . . It is said, however, that the second of these propositions is inconsistent with what is laid down by the L.C. on appeal in the same case. That appeal was directed, not to the first point decided in the Court below, but to the second; but the L.C. (Lord Herschell) thought fit to examine and comment upon the effect of an instrument of dissolution, and he says: ". . . The instrument of dissolution is to set forth certain matters mentioned in sect. 32, sub-sect. 3. There is no provision further than that for determining the rights of members on a dissolution, and no enactment that their rights should be other than those they enjoy under the rules of the society which created the contract between the members." I confess that, having read the judgments more than once, it does seem to me that the last sentence of the L.C. expresses a different view of the effect of an instrument of dissolution from that taken by the learned judge in the Court below. I think that under these circumstances the second proposition cannot be relied on.—p. 612.

BYRNE, J.—In view of the decisions in Strohmeier v. Finsbury Building Society, and Pepe v. City and Suburban Building Society, it is impossible to contend successfully that the right of a member of a building society like the present may not be varied by a new rule made under and in accordance with its statutory power of altering rules: and the rules may be varied so as to affect the rights of a member even after he has given notice of withdrawal. But, as was pointed out by the late Chitty, L.J., in Strohmeier v. Finsbury Building Society, a rule must not change the constitution of the society, and the power of making and altering rules must be confined to the internal rights of the members of the society. In the same case it was also pointed out that there are obvious limits, which the learned judge did not attempt to define, to the powers of making and altering rules, which have to be considered as the cases arise. Those were decisions in respect of the right of making rules where no question of known insolvency at the time of making the rules had arisen. I think Sunderland Universal Building Society, In re, only extends what had been held in Brownlie v. Russell (supra), as to the effect of a winding-up order, to a period anterior to the date of the actual order. In Ambition Investment Building Society, In re (supra), upon a review of the prior authorities, it was held that a right of withdrawal under the rules came to an end when the society or its officers recognised that it must come to an end. In Barnard v. Tomson (supra, col. 277), North, J., held, that there were no materials for drawing a line earlier than the date of the instrument of dissolution. But in the present case . . . at the date of the alteration in 1891, it was known to the officers and members of the society that the society was insolvent, and that liquidation was inevitable.—p. 480.

STIRLING, J.—When the case [Brownlie v. Russell] is carefully examined, it appears to be quite different in its nature. There a holder of a share was insisting on a benefit which was expressly conferred by the rules, and it was held that he had the right to do so, and was not to be deprived of it by any implication which might arise in the absence of express provision. The portion of Lord Selborne's judgment which was so much relied on when read in connection with the context, appears to show this clearly. [His lordship read the judgment and continued.] When that particular contract was looked at it was found that there was an express stipulation dealing with that case. In the present case there is none.—p. 803.

PATTERSON, J.—It is strong to say "overruled," because it is clear that Powell v. Layton would itself have been overruled if brought into the K. B. on error (p. 971). . . . We purposely abstain from giving any opinion, whether the doctrine in Govett v. Radnidge, or that in Powell v. Layton, be the true decision, as we do not feel ourselves called upon to decide between them, supposing them to differ.—p. 975.

GROVE, J.—In . . . Austin v. G. W. Ry., Blackburn, J. says this: "What was said in Marshall v. York, Newcastle and Berwick Ry. was quite correct," and Lush, J., in the same case, assumes that the undertaking to carry the plaintiff amounted to a contract. Therefore, quidneque rido, either there need not be a contract or there was evidence here to go to the jury of an undertaking by the defendants to carry the plaintiff for their own purposes; and the evidence with regard to the issuing of the ticket is not the only evidence applicable to such an issue. When a company take a man into their carriages, treat him as a passenger, examine his ticket to see that it is right, and so on, there is evidence of such an undertaking. Austin v. G. W. Ry., in my opinion, goes even further than the present case. The principle of that case was that the terms under which the company undertook to carry were not complied with; and if a specific agreement between the parties is necessary, in that case there was no such agreement in the ordinary sense, no contract in which the parties were both ad idem and agreeing, yet the Court held that the permitting the child to enter the carriage made the company liable. To my mind that is an à fortiori case to the present. Here the company did, as there, receive the plaintiff into their carriage, and a jury have found that they were negligent. It is said that the negligence was the negligence of the L. & S. W. Co., consisting in their having their platform too low for the carriages; but I do not think the defendants were justified in bringing their train up to such a platform.—p. 97. LOPES, L.J. concurred.

DENMAN, J.—Had Mytton v. Midland Ry. been expressly overruled by Foulkes v. Metropolitan Ry., I should have entertained no doubt but that our decision must be governed by the latter case; but Mytton v. Midland Ry. does not appear to have been cited in the argument or referred to in the judgments, and it is left to us to decide whether it has been overruled. On consideration, however, I have come to the conclusion that the ratio decidendi of Foulkes v. Metropolitan Ry. does in effect overrule Mytton v. Midland Ry., and we must hold accordingly.—p. 104. LINDLEY, J. concurred.

ERLE, C.J.—In Skinner v. London and Brighton Ry. both trains belonged to the same company, and a collision was therefore held to be some evidence of negligence. In Carpue v. London and Brighton Ry. the only point discussed in the Court above was, whether the company were entitled to notice of action. I entirely dissent from the doctrine that the mere happening of an accident throws on the defendant the onus of disproving negligence.—p. 130.

DENMAN, J.—I will first deal with the question whether Hammack v. White is still to be considered as law. I think it is. . . . The subsequent cases in which Hammack v. White has been cited do not in any one instance show that that case is not still good law. No single judge has intimated any dissatisfaction with the decision; but all have rather approved of it.—p. 150.

LINDLEY, J.—It is then said that Cotton v. Wood and Hamnuch v. White have been overruled. In my opinion they are quite consistent with the principle laid down by Erie, C.J., in Scott v. London Dock Co., and I find no case which has expressly overruled them.—p. 153.

HALSBURY, L. C. (for self, LORDS MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON and LINDLEY)—That [case] turned upon the duty of the railway company, which was set out in the declaration, to carry a post-office clerk under certain provisions of railway legislation. It was demurred to, upon the ground that there was no contractual relation between the post-office clerk and the railway company. The judgment upon demurrer is sufficiently explained if one looks at the allegations in the declaration and the judgment upon it. But unfortunately Lord Campbell used a phrase which the learned judge Ameer Ali quotes—that the railway company were under an obligation to carry safely, which their lordships think has been the origin of the error. Lord Campbell says: "... The allegation that it was the duty of the company to use due and proper care and skill in conveying is admitted"—admitted, that is to say, by the demurrer. "That duty does not arise in respect of any contract between the company and the persons conveyed by them, but is one which the law imposes: if they are bound to carry, they are bound to carry safely." ... What Lord Campbell is saying there is that they are not relieved from the ordinary obligations which would exist by contract, because by statute they were compelled to carry the post-office clerk; and he goes on to say that the obligation is not satisfied by carrying a man's corpse and not himself. His mind is not applied at all to the extent of the obligation created, but his mind is upon the argument that there was no obligation at all; and he practically says: "You must take as much care of him as if he was a passenger who contracted with you." Whatever may be the difficulty that arises about such a phrase in Lord Campbell's mouth, there is no difficulty whatever if one looks at the declaration and the assignment of the breach of duty, where the duty is set up, as, indeed, Lord Campbell in the earlier parts of his judgment, points out, to carry with reasonable care and diligence; and the allegation in the declaration, corresponding to the duty which exists, is that they did not do so; and then the assignment of breach is not that the man was not carried safely, which according to the argument would be sufficient, but the allegation is that they did not use proper care and skill in the carrying.—p. 65.

MELLOR, J.—I am inclined to think, notwithstanding the great weight which must be attached to the opinion expressed by Lord Wensleydale, in *Chilton v. A. L. SMITH, L.J.—*Alton v. No question was or could be raised as to what would have been the result if the servant's remedy against the company had been founded upon tort. . . . This case, when looked into, is not the authority which it was supposed to be, and in no way decides that an action brought for personal injury against a company by a passenger who has taken a ticket is necessarily an action upon contract and not upon tort.—Id.

SELBORNE, L.C.—Two of the five learned judges who so agreed (Collins, J. and A. L. Smith, L.J.) referred to . . . Pounder v. N. E. Ry. . . . How far they may have considered it an authority to govern the case before them I cannot say; but, for my own part, if I thought it necessary in the present case, to consider the correctness of that decision, I doubt whether I should be prepared to follow it. The facts, as I understand them, were, that the servants of the N. E. Co., having distinct notice that the plaintiff was, on reasonable grounds, apprehensive that an assault would be committed on him by certain other passengers by the same train, if he were compelled to travel in the same carriage with them without protection, he was nevertheless compelled so to travel, and was left unprotected, with the result that the apprehended assault was committed. I am unable, at present, to see any distinction satisfactory to my own mind between such a case and that which the M.R. justly distinguished from the present, when he said that (in this case) it "was not alleged that the plaintiff was being ill-used or assaulted on the train, and that, the fact being made known to the defendant's servants, they did not interfere to prevent it." The present case is quite different; the plaintiff's complaint was made not before, but after he had been robbed.—p. 630.

LORDS WATSON, MACNAGHTEN and SHAND agreed, and refrained from expressing any opinion on Pounder's Case, the latter observing that in any view it was distinguishable on the facts.

COCKBURN, C.J. (for the Court) [repeated in his judgment the judgments of himself and the other judges in Praeger v. Bristol and Exeter Ry.; Siner's Case having been there distinguished on two grounds, viz., (1) That there was in Praeger's Case a clear invitation to alight, and (2) That the danger to be incurred was not apparent].—The case is distinguishable from that of Bridges v. North London Ry. on the ground that in the latter the carriage from which the passenger alighted had been drawn up in a tunnel in the vicinity of the station. In that case there was no evidence that the train had come to a final standstill, or in other words, arrived at the spot where the company's servants intended the passengers to alight. The question, therefore, was whether there was evidence of anything done by the company's servants which induced the passenger to believe it had so arrived, and act on that belief. But in the present case the evidence of the conduct of the company's servants was such as to warrant the jury in finding that the train had really come to the final standstill, and that the company's servants meant the passengers to get out there or be carried on.—p. 143.

But in this case we have what was not in Siner's Case, an invitation to the passengers to alight, and the Court of Ex. Ch. held, in Cockle v. London & S. E. Ry. (supra), that in such a state of circumstances the passenger was justified in getting out, and there was evidence of negligence on the part of the company.—p. 87.

MELLISH, L.J. to the same effect.

BRETT, J.A.—It appears to me that the judgment of the H. L. in Bridges v. North London Ry. puts an end to a long controversy, not as to the law, but as to the mode of dealing with these cases. Some of the judges seem to have been of opinion that these cases should as much as possible be withdrawn from the jury, and that the Court ought to say what was reasonable for a passenger to do. The H. L. held, that as the carrying of railway passengers was conduct in the ordinary affairs of life, the jury was the proper tribunal to decide. Siner v. G. W. Ry. was decided in the heat of the controversy, and without saying that it ought to be overruled, I may say that it was decided by judges who thought that these cases ought to be left to the judge and not to the jury.—p. 89. same opinion. But I did not say that there is not always a preliminary question for the judge to decide, namely, whether there is any evidence to go to the jury. On the contrary, I asserted it, and in my answer to the H. L. I laid it down that there is a question for the judge to decide.—p. 373.

Amphlett, L.J. founded himself at the outset on Bridges v. North London Ry. in this House. He states: "It is now settled by that case (though previously doubted by many eminent judges), that the question whether, in cases of this sort, negligence can be inferred from a given state of facts, is itself a question of fact for the jury, and not a question of law for the Court or presiding judge." And, in like manner, the L.C.J. states, at the conclusion of his judgment:—"All that remains is to consider whether it was reasonably competent to the jury, if they thought that negligence was proved, to connect the accident to the plaintiff with that negligence as its cause, or as materially contributing thereto. I cannot doubt, especially after the decision of the H. L. in Bridges v. North London Ry., that this was a matter of which the jury were the proper judges, and which it was incumbent on the presiding judge to leave to their decision." These expressions of the learned judges appear to me to be of great importance, for I infer from them that if they had not considered Bridges v. North London Ry. to have the effect which they attribute to it, their decision in the present case might have been different. Now, my lords, I am bound to say that I cannot look at the case of Bridges as in any degree establishing the proposition which it appeared to Amphlett, L.J. to establish, namely, that whether in cases of this sort negligence can be inferred from any given state of facts is itself a question of fact for the jury, or as establishing the proposition which it appeared to the L.C.J. to establish, namely, that the jurors are the proper judges whether, if once any negligence is proved, the accident which has occurred is to be connected with such negligence as its cause, or as materially contributing thereto. Your lordships, in the case of Bridges, did not lay down, and I am satisfied your lordships did not mean to lay down, any new rule upon this subject. It is indeed impossible to lay down any rule except that which at the outset I referred to—namely, that from any given state of facts the judge must say whether negligence can legitimately be inferred, and the jury whether it ought to be inferred.—p. 199.

LORD BLACKBURN.—Since the decision of your lordships' House in Bridges v. North London Ry. it has been more than once said in the Courts below that your lordships had not perhaps overruled the law laid down in Ryder v. Wombwell [(1858) 38 L. J. Ex. 8; 1 L. R. 4 Ex. 32. See "INFANT,"] but at least laid down this exception to it, that in cases of railway accidents the jurors were to decide. In Robson v. N. E. Ry. (col. 288) Brett, L.J. says: "The H. L. held that as the carrying of railway passengers was conduct in the ordinary affairs of life, the jury ought to decide." My lords, I quite agree that this consideration ought never to be lost sight of, but I cannot think it decisive. . . . But I own myself unable to see anything in Bridges v. North London Ry. which justifies the conclusion that your lordships either laid down, or meant to lay down, any new rule on the subject. I think the utmost extent to which your lordships' decision in that case can fairly be pressed is, that in such cases the judges should be cautious before they say that the jury could not legitimately draw the inference which they did draw; and to this I agree.—p. 209.

LORD GORDON.—In the present case I must say that during the argument I felt much inclined to agree with the view taken of the decision of this House in the case of Bridges by the L.C.J. and Amphlett, L.J. . . . But having considered that case more maturely, with the assistance which your lordships have received from his lordship on the woolsack, who took part in that decision in this House, I am now satisfied that the view taken by these learned lords was not the right one, and that no fixed or general rule . . . was laid down by the case of Bridges.—p. 211.

MELLOR, J.—It does appear very difficult to distinguish this case from that, so far as the duty to provide a gatekeeper is concerned, but my brother Lush has suggested a distinction in the course of the argument, and if it be not the distinction I really cannot suggest any other, viz., that where a railway company is empowered to make their railway and to use it, and to cross a road on the level, and they make a bridge so near as to obstruct the sight of the person who has to cross, so as to impose a difficulty or a danger which was not contemplated by the legislature, they are bound to use extra precautions, and such a case may be distinguished from the present possibly on that ground. I am not very clear that that is a sound distinction, but it is a distinction upon which possibly we might have felt at liberty to act if we had found it necessary to do so. Without expressing any further opinion upon Bilbee v. L. B. & S. C. Ry., I think that, if the present case cannot be distinguished upon the grounds I have mentioned, we should be bound by it in this Court.—p. 263.

LUSH, J.—It may be, and I am inclined to think it is, a sound principle that if the railway company, in the construction of works so authorised—in the exercise of the discretion which the legislature has vested in them—do anything which prevents persons passing over the line from taking care of themselves, and exposes them to greater peril than is ordinarily incident to a level crossing, the company thereby impose upon themselves an obligation to take other than the usual precautions for the protection of persons who have a right to pass there, and, as it were, to make up to the public for that which they have taken away from them. That I take to be the principle of Bilbee v. L. B. & S. C. Ry. As I read the case, it may well be sustained upon that principle. If it cannot, then I do not see any ground upon which it can be sustained. But it appears to me, although the principle is not enunciated in that specific form, that that is the ground upon which the learned judges in that case acted.—p. 264.

BRAMWELL, B.—In that case the allegation that the plaintiff was lawfully crossing the line was not traversed. There is a further distinction between that case and this. A habit of crossing in a definite track known to the servants of the railway company is one thing, and the habit of crossing anywhere on the line, as alleged in this case, is quite another. In the former case, the decision in Barrett v. Midland Ry. may possibly be law. In the unreported case of Hill v. N. E. Ry. I was not present at the argument of the rule, and I should have concurred in the decision with the greatest reluctance.—p. 335. PIGOTT and FOLLOCK, BB. concurred.

BRETT, J.A.—I do not recollect exactly how far that case decided the present point. If it is a decision contrary to our present judgment, then I can only say with deference I do not agree with it. . . . Stewart v. L. & N. W. Ry. was the case of an excursion train; and Bramwell, B. in the Court below, feeling that he must not overrule a case in a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, went through the other process, which is never very difficult to an ingenious mind, that is, where you do not like a case and must not overrule it, you distinguish it. That process he performed with his usual skill. But, sitting here, I do not think one is bound to undertake that task. I think one may fairly say at once that one does not agree with Stewart v. L. & N. W. Ry. I cannot see any difference between that case and this, although in that case it was an excursion train. If a railway company chooses to take a man's luggage away from him, and takes it in-charge themselves, it seems to me it is no less an article or thing carried by the railway because the train is an excursion train. I, therefore, with great deference, do not agree with that case, and think it ought to be overruled.—p. 264. And see post, col. 303.

HALESBURY, L.C.—I do not know that it is absolutely necessary in this case to determine what is the exact contract between the company and the passengers, since the learned [County Court] judge has found negligence against the company; and I do not understand that there is any difference of opinion among us, that if there was any contract to take care of the bag, there is sufficient evidence of negligence. But I must express my opinion that the views expressed by Lord Truro, Jervis, C.J., Williams, Crowder, Willes, Keating and M. Smith, J.J. do not appear to have had sufficient weight given to them (see Richards v. L. B. & S. C. Ry.; Talley v. G. W. Ry.; Butcher v. L. & S. W. Ry.) by the judgment of the C.A. in Berghem v. G. E. Ry. All these learned judges appear to me to adopt the view that a railway company, in accepting a passenger's luggage for carriage in a passenger train, and in the carriage with the passenger himself, do enter into a contract as common carriers, modified only to the extent that if loss happens by reason of want of care of the passenger himself, who has taken within his own immediate control the goods which are lost, their contract as insurers does not apply to loss occasioned by the passenger's own default. In Berghem v. G. E. Ry. the C.A., commenting upon Talley v. G. W. Ry., do not, I think, quite accurately represent the judgment of the Court of C. P. In Talley v. G. W. Ry. that judgment expressly assumes the general liability of the company as common carriers, but that the general liability was modified by the implied condition that the passenger should use reasonable care, the fact being that the loss was caused by his neglect to do so, and would not have happened without such negligence. The negligence in question was, leaving his portmanteau in a carriage unprotected by his presence; it was found at the end of a journey out open and its contents rifled, in a carriage which he had originally travelled in as far as Swindon, but which he had negligently omitted to re-enter upon leaving the refreshment-room at that station.—p. 366.

BLACKBURN, J.—I also think (if I rightly understand the judgment) that though that decision goes a step further than any prior decision of which I am aware, it is a logical extension of a principle which had been previously recognised by the Courts, and therefore I not only obey that decision, but acquiesce in it. But there are expressions used by the different lords which seem to express opinions which were not, I think, part of the decision of the case before them, and which are not, in my opinion, correct when applied to the case before us, of a ticket given on the deposit of goods with a company who do not hold themselves forth as general receivers of goods to be kept for hire, but let it be known that though they do not and will not as a general rule receive or keep such goods, they will take them if the passenger brings them to a particular office, and there receives a ticket, on the production of which the goods will be given up to the person producing it.—p. 733.

STEPHEN, J. (for self, HAWKINS and V. WILLIAMS, JJ.), after discussing Van Toll v. S. E. Ry., Lewis v. McKee, and Zunz v. S. E. Ry., continued Cockburn, C.J. (in Zunz v. S. E. Ry.) does not say to what authorities he referred. Probably Van Toll v. S. E. Ry. and Lewis v. McKee would be two of them. They are the strongest cases in that direction which we have been able to find, though they do not appear to have been cited in the argument, which turned to a great extent upon other topics. . . . There have, however, been several subsequent decisions which, though not inconsistent with Zunz v. S. E. Ry., show that it cannot be regarded as a complete statement of the law. . . . In this case [Henderson v. Stevenson] a passenger by a steamboat took a ticket on the face of which appeared the words "Dublin to Whitehaven." On the back were the words, "The company incurs no liability in respect of loss, injury or delay to the passenger or to his luggage, whether arising from the act, neglect or default of the company or their servants, or otherwise." There was no reference on the front of the ticket to the back of it, and the plaintiff swore that he did not look at it. It was held that the notice did not affect the company's liability. The facts of the case were so peculiar that it can hardly form a precedent for any other. . . . The principle upon which the case was decided is expressed in a very few words by Lord Cairns: "The question does not depend upon any technicality of law or upon any careful examination of authorities. It is a question simply of common sense. Can it be held that where a person is entering into a contract containing terms which de facto he does not know, and as to which he has received no notice that he ought to inform himself upon them" (the words "he is to be bound by these terms," or some equivalent, appear to have dropped out of the report). "It appears to me impossible that that can be held." It may be added that though the case was decided mainly on this ground, several of their lordships, and in particular Lord Chelmsford and Hatherley, entertained doubts as to the right of the defendants to attach such a condition as the one in question to the contract to carry. . . . In this case [Harris v. G. W. Ry.] the luggage of a person who had been a passenger by the G. W. Ry. was deposited by her brother on her behalf with the servants of the company at the cloak-room, and the depositor received a ticket which on its face enumerated the articles received, stated the charge at 2d. for each, and ended with these words: "Left in the name of . . . and subject to the conditions on the other side." On the back were conditions, one of which limited the liability of the company to 5s. for each package unless a certain higher rate were charged. The person who deposited the articles said that he did not read the conditions on the back of the ticket, but admitted that he "believed there were some conditions." The judges . . . held that the plaintiff was bound by the conditions on the back of the ticket. . . . Lord Blackburn elaborately distinguishes the case from Henderson v. Stevenson on grounds similar to those which we have already stated. . . . He there says that in Henderson v. Stevenson there was nothing to show that the steamboat company would believe from the conduct of the passenger that he had represented to them that he had read or looked at the back of the ticket, and, in point of fact, he had not. . . . Gabell v. S. E. Ry. was decided at the same time by the same judgment [as Parker v. S. E. Ry.], the facts and directions given to the jury being identical in the two cases. The facts in each case closely resembled those of Harris v. G. W. Ry. In each case a bag was left at a cloak-room, 2d. was paid, and a ticket received which had printed upon it the words, "See back." On the back were conditions, of which one was, "The company will not be responsible for any package exceeding the value of 10l." Each plaintiff denied that he had read the words on the ticket or seen a printed notice to the same effect hung up in the cloak-room. . . . In this case [Burke v. S. E. Ry.] the plaintiff took a ticket from London to Paris from the defendants. On the outside of the cover was, "Cheap return ticket, London to Paris and back—second class," and other matter, but no reference to the inside of the cover. On the inside was a condition limiting the responsibility of the defendants to their own trains. The plaintiff was injured while travelling in France. He sued the defendants, and said he had not read the condition and did not know of it. Cockburn, C.J. asked the jury the question suggested in Parker v. S. E. Ry., and they answered it in favour of the plaintiff. The defendants moved to have judgment entered for them, and this was done, the Divisional Court holding that the book was the contract, and that the condition was an indivisible part of it. The judgment in this case can hardly be supported by any principle short of that laid down in Zunz v. S. E. Ry., if indeed it does not go further. . . . All of them

[the cases] are in favour of the defendant except Parker v. S. E. Ry. . . . It must be remembered that the precise question before the Court in Parker v. S. E. Ry. was not whether the question in that case was one of law or of fact, but whether the questions put to the jury by the learned judges ex ante were proper, which, as all the Court agreed, they were not. It must also be observed that . . . the question before the Court related to the common law contract of the bailment of goods for safe custody, the nature of which is well known in the absence of special terms agreed to by the parties. The present case relates to a contract of a different kind—namely, the deposit of an article for sale on commission, as to which the terms must necessarily depend upon the agreement of the parties, as none are ascertained by the common law. Besides, all the judges in Parker v. S. E. Ry. agreed that the effect of the delivery of a document containing terms must depend on the nature of the contract to which it related.—pp. 122–126.

HERSCHELL, L.C.—That was a case in its broad features very similar to this, inasmuch as the plaintiff there had deposited some luggage at the luggage office of one of the railway companies, and received in return for the deposit of the luggage a ticket on which there was printed "See back"; and on the back were certain conditions by which it was sought to limit the liability of the company. The majority of the C. A. held that they could not say, as matter of law, that by reason of taking that ticket in exchange for the goods the plaintiff was bound by the conditions; that those questions were to be determined by the jury, and that upon their determination would depend the liability of the defendants. . . . Now what are the facts, . . . which were proved before the jury? That the plaintiff paid the money for her passage for the voyage in question, and that she received this ticket handed to her folded up by the ticket clerk, so that no writing was visible unless she opened and read it. . . . Nothing was said to draw her attention to the fact that this ticket contained any conditions; and the argument of the appellants is and must be this, that where there are no facts beyond those which I have stated, the defendants are entitled as matter of law to say that the plaintiff is bound by those conditions. That seems to me to be absolutely in the teeth of the judgment of the C. A. in Parker v. S. E. Ry., with which I entirely agree: and it does not seem either to be consistent, when the case is carefully considered, with Henderson v. Scrimmon (supra, col. 294), in your lordships' House.—p. 284. LORDS WATSON, ASHBOURNE and MORRIS concurred.

JERVIS, C.J.—In *Wyld v. notwithstanding the notice, bound to take ordinary care in the carriage of the goods, and is liable, not only for any act which amounts to a total abandonment of his character of a carrier, or for wilful negligence, but also for a conversion by a misdelivery arising from inadvertence or mistake, if such inadvertence or mistake might have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care.—p. 150. And see post, cols. 301, 303.

(for self and WIGHTMAN, J.; CROMPTON, J. dissenting).—One case can be cited deserving particular notice, Baily v. Merrell, from Bulstrode, in which it was held, between carrier and the owner of the goods to be carried, that, although the defendant had represented the goods to be of a given weight, an action would not lie against him on the ground that they were of much greater weight, whereby the plaintiff's horse had been injured in drawing them. But there the representation must have been free from fraud, and the reason given for the decision is, that the carrier might, without difficulty, have ascertained the true weight of the goods. Therefore this can only be regarded as an authority that the carrier has no right to expect any communication respecting the nature of the goods, where he may himself easily discover it.—p. 63.

WILLES, J.—That was an action for the loss of a greyhound which had been delivered to the defendant, a carrier. The dog had no collar, but was taken to the defendant's warehouse with a string round its neck, and the defendant's servants gave a receipt for it, which was not done here. The dog in that case was afterwards tied by this string to a watch-box, and it slipped from its noose and was lost. Lord Ellenborough held that the defendant in that case was responsible, and he said that it was not like the case of a delivery of goods imperfectly packed, since there the defect was not visible, but that there the defendant had the means of seeing that the dog was insufficiently secured. . . . Obviously, that case is a very different one from the present, because here the dog was delivered with a collar and a strap, which clearly indicated that the proper mode of securing the animal was by these. The present case differs from Stuart v. Crawley in two particulars. In the first place the company are not common carriers of dogs, and in the next place the dog which was delivered in that case was evidently not intended to be secured by the string, and the defendant had the means of seeing how it ought to be secured, whereas here the company had a right to suppose that the collar and strap were intended for securing the dog.—p. 63.

Owen v. Burnett (1834) 3 L. J. Ex. 76; 2 C. & M. 353; 4 Tyr. 133, commented on.
Hinton v. Dibbin (1842) 2 Q. B. 646; 2 G. & D. 36; 6 Jur. 601.

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court), after discussing the earlier decisions, said: "It remains only to advert to Owen v. Burnett, upon which much reliance was placed in the course of the argument, not for the sake of the decision, but the language of two of the learned judges, who are supposed to have intimated an opinion that, although the article damaged was amongst those enumerated in the Act, the carrier would still have been liable for the damage if guilty 'of gross negligence.'" Vaughan, B., in giving judgment for the defendant, is reported to have said, "If gross negligence were made out it would be different." Bayley, B., the other judge referred to, does not in terms so express himself, nor is what he says necessarily equivalent, and we have before taken occasion to observe upon the manner in which in this same case he speaks of "gross negligence." But, supposing it to be so, the observation is wholly extra-judicial, and unnecessary for the decision of the case. That decision is in favour of these defendants. For it was expressly found by the jury that the loss was occasioned by the negligence of the carrier alone; and yet the judgment was in his favour. Moreover, in the same case the Court showed a disinclination to limit the operation of the statute: for, whereas in the preamble mention is made of valuable packages in "small compass," and thence an argument was urged that to such only would the Act be applicable, the Court held the contrary, and that it did apply to a package which is stated in the case to have been "of a considerable size." In no other case has the question now before us been even noticed.—p. 665.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self, BAGGALLAY, and BRIET, L.J.)—In holding that the defendants were liable for damages for the detention, although not for the loss of these articles, the learned judge followed what he understood to be the law as laid down in Hearn v. L. & S. W. Ry. That case at first sight appears in favour of the plaintiff. But if the pleadings demurred to are carefully examined, it will be found that the plaintiff, in his new assignment, carefully negated the loss of the goods for the detention of which he was suing, and the point really decided was that where goods which ought to be declared and are not declared are detained by a carrier without being lost by him, he is liable for such detention. This is consistent with the language of the Carriers Act, which exonerates carriers from liability for loss or injury to certain kinds of goods if not declared, but does not exonerate carriers from their liability for the undue detention of such goods. In this case, however, the learned judge found as a fact that the goods were lost within the meaning of the Carriers Act, although the loss was only temporary; and, assuming this finding to be correct, it appears to us impossible to hold the carriers irresponsible for the loss, but responsible for detention caused by the loss. There is nothing in the Carriers Act to warrant such a refinement, nor does the decision in Hearn v. L. & S. W. Ry., as has already been shown.—p. 129.

WILLES, J.—I know that in Hart v. Baxendale, although this does not appear in the report, the Court of Ex. intimated that silk hose was within the statute, and that the ruling of Lord Abinger, in Davey v. Mason, could not be sustained.—p. 267.

COCKBURN, C.J. and CROWDER, J. to the same effect.

BYLES, J.—I concur in correcting the opinion I expressed at nisi prius as to the silk guards, which I considered not within the Act, according to the ruling of Lord Abinger in Davey v. Mason. That ruling, I find, has been since reflected upon by the Court of Ex., and I now agree that the word "silks" in the Act comprehends silk made up into any article.—p. 268.

G. W. Ry. v. Rimell (1857) 27 L. J. C. P. 201; 18 C. B. 575.

JERVIS, C.J.—I think the judge has entirely misconceived the judgment of this Court in Butt v. G. W. Ry., because, when the defendants rely upon the statute for their defence, negligence has nothing to do with the question. The rule is this: under the statute, felony by a servant is a sufficient answer to the defence set up by the carrier, and negligence has no effect one way or the other. Where the defence is independent of the statute, negligence alone is a sufficient answer. Under the statute felony is an answer; under the carrier's notice negligence is an answer. That is the result of the decision in Butt v. G. W. Ry.; we only decided that felony by the defendant's servants without negligence on their part was not a good answer to a defence that the value of the goods was not declared according to the notice.—p. 205. CRESSWELL and WILLIAMS, JJ. concurred.

WILLES, J.—I am glad the L.C.J. has explained Butt v. G. W. Ry., for the case is cited in modern text-books as an authority under the statute with which it had nothing whatever to do.—ib.

McQueen v. G. W. Ry. (1875) 44 L. J. Q. B. 180; L. R. 10 Q. B. 569; 32 L. T. 759; 23 W. R. 698; 13 Cox C. C. 88.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I quite agree with the doctrine involved in the decision of the Court in Vaughton v. L. & N. W. Ry. to this extent, that it is not necessary to show, in order to make out a replication of a felonious act on the part of the carrier's servants, that the taking was by any particular servant or servants. It is enough if there is proof to satisfy the jury that the taking was by some one who was more or less one of the company's servants, without specifying particularly which of them. But when we are dealing with the propositions involved in the directions which I gave to the jury in this case upon what I then considered to be the substance of the ruling of the late Pigott, B., in Vaughton v. L. & N. W. Ry., the language of that judgment, I think, when we apply it to the particular facts of that case, must be understood in a much more limited sense than that which appears when it is looked at more with reference to the words and the language used, than with reference to the particular facts of the case. But, looking at the language of that judgment, which I followed almost verbatim in the direction that I gave to the jury, it comes to this, that where, in the opinion of the jury, the facts are more consistent with the guilt of the carrier's servants than that of any person not in their employ, then the carrier is called upon for an answer, and if the conduct of certain persons is impugned, and if those persons are not called as witnesses, the inference would be that a felony has been committed by them. I think that proposition is not maintainable. It appears to me that the question of probability or improbability can only be considered as an ingredient or element in the consideration of the general case. But, in considering the proposition of whether the fact that a felony has been committed by the company's servant or servants has or has not been established, or whether the suspicion is that they have been guilty of felony, rather than that a stranger or strangers have been, because though they had an opportunity of access they had not such great opportunities of access, the greater or less degree of probability cannot be an element in the consideration of the question.—p. 133.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I think that the decision in *Cohen v. S. E. The word "servant" in the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, s. 7, I think, from the subject-matter of the Act, embraces not merely servants properly so called, but also the agents, whom, though not strictly servants, the companies employ to do for them what they have contracted to do. This was the construction put on the same word in an analogous enactment, sect. 8 of the Carriers Act: see Machin v. L. & S. W. Ry.—p. 810.

BLACKBURN, J.—Right or wrong that case [Simons v. G. W. Ry.] is expressly in point in your favour.

COCKBURN, C.J.—It is so; that case is decisive on that point. The Court of C. P. there, however, seem also to intimate an opinion on a point which it was not necessary to decide; namely, that the condition that "no claim for damage will be allowed unless made within three days after the delivery of the goods, nor for loss, unless made within three days of the time when they should be delivered," is just and reasonable within the statute—a proposition which, with great deference to that Court, I consider very questionable. Three days is a very short time. Perhaps the consignee may not open the package until the fourth day, when he finds the goods damaged through the negligence of the company's servants; and the consignee who does not receive goods may not know that they have been sent to him, while the consignor may not know that they have not reached their destination.—p. 146 CROMPTON, HILL and BLACKBURN, JJ. concurred.

ERLE, C.J.—It is said that we are concluded by authority, and that Baxendale v. L. & S. W. Ry. and Garton v. Bristol and Exeter Ry. are in point. In answer to this, I beg to say that the argument from authority seems to me to be without conclusive force in guiding the exercise of this jurisdiction; the question whether undue prejudice has been caused being a question of fact, depending on the matters proved in each case. . . . On the authority of these two cases Mr. Palmer now moves for another injunction; and I have been thus obliged either to grant every such application or to reconsider the question of authority, and I have come to the conclusion that it ought not to bind in the manner that a precedent in law binds.—p. 291. M. SMITH, J. concurred.

KEATING, J.—It was indeed argued in addition on behalf of the company, that, even if the preference was systematic, yet, provided it were for the convenience of the public at large, it would be allowable, and for this position the judgment of Erle, C.J., in Palmer v. L. & S. W. Ry. was referred to. I do not think that the L.C.J. in that case intended to lay it down that a company might create a monopoly in its own favour, to the disadvantage of the rest of the trade, even to suit the convenience of the public; but merely that, in determining what amount of departure from a general rule would be justifiable, public convenience was an element in the consideration of such a question, and that in that particular case the company were justified in what they had done.—p. 136. HAWKINS, J.—To me it seems that this question is concluded by Peek v. North Staffordshire Ry. above referred to, where it was expressly held that a condition exempting the company from responsibility for injury, however caused, without limitation or exception, was neither just nor reasonable, for such a condition would, if valid, exempt them from liability for loss or damage happening through the grossest, most culpable negligence, or even wilful misconduct. In my opinion, the condition relied on by the now defendants that they will not be liable "in any case" unless a declaration of value is signed and delivered to them at the time of booking, would equally, in the absence of such declaration, cover every loss however occasioned. . . . Harrison v. L. B. & S. C. Ry. must, therefore, as far as it affects the question before us, be considered as virtually overruled.—p. 132.

LORD BLACKBURN.—The spirit and object of the enactment in the Railway and Canal Traffic Act are very well expressed in Beal v. South Devon Ry.—p. 711.

LORD WATSON.—The only point which that learned [County Court] judge seems to have had in view in delivering judgment, and in subsequently framing a case between the parties, was whether every contract between a railway company and a trader which exempts the railway company from the consequences of the default or negligence of their servants, is necessarily an illegal contract. The learned judge in his opinion, to the terms of which I need not particularly advert, plainly drew from Peek v. North Staffordshire Ry. what I consider to be an erroneous inference, namely, that it had been held by this House that such a condition could in no circumstances be inserted in a written contract between the parties without rendering that contract or condition null and void under the statute of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. . . . Then as regards the special rate, I am not prepared to adopt the view which seems to have been taken by the learned judges of the Appeal Court, that whenever the lower rate without liability on the part of the company is such as to induce the bulk of the traders to prefer it to the ordinary rate with liability on the part of the company, the conditions attached to the lower rate must necessarily be illegal and void. That does not appear to me to be a reasonable construction of the words of the statute, "just and reasonable condition." It does not appear to me to be warranted by the judgment of this House in Peek v. North Staffordshire Ry. That case authoritatively decides, upon the statute, these three points—in the first place, that a condition of this kind must be in writing in order to bind the trader; in the second place, that it must be proved to the satisfaction of the Court to be a reasonable condition; and, in the third place, that the onus of showing that it is a reasonable condition rests upon the railway company who allege it.—pp. 714–715.

LORD BRAMWELL.—Peek v. North Staffordshire Ry. was decided twenty years ago. At the time it was decided, and from thence continuously until now, I have thought it was wrongly decided, as I know it was contrary to the intention of the framers of the Act; and this case confirms me in that opinion. For here is a contract made by a fishmonger and a carrier of fish who know their business, and whether it is just and reasonable is to be settled by me, who am neither fishmonger nor carrier, nor with any knowledge of their business. And although that case has been in existence for twenty years, and has been acted upon in Courts of law, if it were within my competency to overrule it I would do so, because it is impossible to say that people have regulated their contracts in reference to it: they have done nothing of the sort. What they have done is this: they have entered into their contracts without reference to it, and when it has become convenient they have broken those contracts, and having had the benefit of them they have turned round and have sought to avoid them.—p. 716. LORD FITZGERALD concurred.

MATHEW, J.—Hoare v. G. W. Ry. and Goldsmith v. G. E. Ry.... are no authorities for saying that mere misdelivery, which is all that is proved here, is evidence of wilful misconduct. Hoare v. G. W. Ry. is a much stronger case than the one before us. In that case the station-master, knowing the name of a particular person, and knowing it was not the name upon the goods, chose to give up the goods without even an inquiry, and I gather that the goods were lost. It was held, there was evidence of wilful misconduct; but it cannot be said that it is any authority for the proposition that misdelivery is evidence of wilful misconduct. Then, again, Goldsmith v. G. E. Ry. was only a question as to the construction of the contract, and in that case the contract was held not to cover delay, for the simple reason that "delay" did not appear in the excepted perils.—p. 825.

JESSEL, M.R.—It was said first, that this order, which is an order to appoint additional trustees of a charity, ought not to have been made, because this was a contentious case, and that the charity commissioners have no jurisdiction to decide contentious cases. That was founded on the 5th section of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1860. . . . The meaning of that section I should have thought to have been plain and obvious. It is that the charity commissioners should not be compelled to take upon themselves the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by this Act in any case in which they considered it could be so much better dealt with by a judicial Court, that it would be improper for them to exercise that jurisdiction. . . . It was not that they might decline the jurisdiction altogether. It was not any case in which they might consider they ought not to exercise it—that would have enabled them to repudiate the jurisdiction—but it was that they might decline to exercise it in any one of the cases named, or for other reasons, meaning for special reasons of the same kind, or of a similar kind. But if the charity commissioners considered they ought to exercise the jurisdiction, this section, it appears to me, did not interfere with it at all. . . . I find that in the case of the Hackney Charities Lord Romilly appears to have taken a different view from mine. I may mention that that decision itself is no authority, because it was reversed on appeal, and still less, therefore, can an obiter dictum of the judge who decided that case be binding upon me; but it does certainly appear that the view taken by his lordship was that the charity commissioners had no jurisdiction in contentious cases. . . . However, not considering myself bound by that dictum, feeling myself free to give my own opinion as to the construction of the section, I am compelled to say it appears to me so plain and so clear, that, notwithstanding that dictum, I do not feel it necessary to call upon counsel to argue on the other side.—p. 342.

WOOD, L.J.*—It appears to me that Lister's Hospital, In re, is manifestly distinguishable from this. The Court there agreed with the view which I had taken in a previous case, namely, that a petition of that nature did not deal with the charity quâ charity; but there being already a well-constituted charity and a pending matter, namely, the payment of money into Court, which was necessarily applicable to lands to be held upon the same uses, the petition was not an original petition to regulate the charity itself, but was simply for the purpose of doing that which the common order and forms of the Court would require to be done, namely, to invest a sum of money which had to be invested as if in the case of an ordinary settlement. That seemed to me not to come within the purview of the Act. But here, if there be any one thing more plain than another, it is that these persons cannot have any benefit until the charity is established by the fund being appropriated for this purpose.—p. 806. SELWYN, L.J. concurred.

HALL, V.-C.—It was said that Holme v. Guy is an authority that such a case as this is not within the provisions of the Act. It appears to me that all the remarks of the M.R. in that case, instead of tending to show that this is not a case within the Act, show clearly that it is within it. The evil of having proceedings taken in such a case which might lead to no good result, is one which must be carefully borne in mind and considered.—p. 609.

Gregg*, in which it was said that the dilatory action taken by Lord Chelmsford as L.C. had been afterwards disapproved by the C.A. here. On examination of Lord Chelmsford's decision in Att.-Gen. v. Sidney Sussex College, it does not appear to me that it is that portion of Lord Chelmsford's decision which is disapproved of by the Court in Glen v. Gregg, but the action taken by the L.C. in a case in which ex concessio the consent of the charity commissioners was required in deciding to allow such consent to be waived, and to proceed with the action, although such consent had not been acquired. In doing that Lord Chelmsford was enabling the parties to consent to waive a bar which was instituted for the benefit of the public and for the protection of charities. I think the C.A. might well consider that such action by the L.C. was not to be justified upon the ordinary principles of law; and I think it is to such a point that the criticism in Glen v. Gregg was directed. It does not appear to me that Glen v. Gregg in any way decides, or was intended to decide, that in a case in which the consent of the commissioners was required, but had not been obtained, the Court might not cure the blot by allowing the action to stand over.—p. 159. CHITTY, J.—There [Braund v. Devon (Earl)] an attempt was made to present the case in favour of the plaintiff as a private trust, as distinct from a charitable trust and for that purpose reliance was placed on Blanford v. Thackerell (supra). But in Blanford v. Thackerell there were two distinct things. There was an attempt on the part of the testator to create a charitable trust, which failed; but there remained a good private trust which was capable of being enforced. As was pointed out by both the L.JJ. in Braund v. Devon (Earl), the plaintiff's case was neither more nor less than this: "I am an object of the charity." Braund v. Devon (Earl) remains wholly unaffected by the judgment of Bowen and Fry, L.JJ. in Rendall v. Blair. . . . The substance of Bowen, L.J.'s judgment is that the plaintiff, [master of a charity school] was suing by virtue of a common law right. . . . Having regard to the undertaking given, the plaintiff's case, in the result as presented, was: There are trespassers, persons calling themselves managers who are not managers, who are endeavouring to interfere with my common law right, which is incident to my possession. Fry, L.J. agreed with that judgment, adding only one word of explanation, and the explanation was that he did not intend to confine the principle of the judgment to cases of common law right only, but extended it to individual equitable rights not relating to the administration of the trusts of the charity. That was, for the purposes of the decision, a dictum—a dictum, however, in which Bowen, L.J. immediately concurred in a short second judgment. . . . What exact cases the L.J. [Fry] was referring to it is not necessary for me to consider in detail—possibly the case of an equitable right to specific performance of a contract; and there may be others. . . . This proposition was laid hold of by the plaintiff's counsel to show that whenever a person can say, "I am an object of the charity," he can maintain an action in regard to the charity without the consent of the charity commissioners. In other words, the proposition is forced to this extent, that by this incidental observation, the two L.JJ. overruled the decision of their predecessors in Braund v. Devon (Earl). The L.JJ. did not even mention that case, and had no intention of overruling it.—pp. 487—489.

DAVEY, L.J. (for self, HENSCHALL, L.C. and LINDLEY, L.J.).—In Sons of Clergy Corporation v. Sutton Lord Romilly put a construction on these sections. Although in the result Lord Romilly's conclusion may not differ much from that which we have endeavoured to express, we cannot agree with him in the reasons which he gave for his judgment. We do not think it was a legitimate mode of interpreting the Act (Charitable Trusts Act, 1853), first to consider sect. 62 and then to construe the interpretation clause by sect. 62 of the Act. Lord Romilly held that the word "endowment" in sect. 66 applied only to endowments for a special purpose in connection with a charity, and not to endowments for the general purposes of the charity. As we have already said, we cannot agree with this construction of sect. 66, and we may add that it seems to us inconsistent with the other sections—see, for example, sect. 44. Lord Romilly's view has been followed in other cases, but apparently on his authority without the expression of any opinion as to its correctness by the judges who adopted and followed it. The test whether the property of a charity is an endowment within the meaning of the Act is not whether it is applicable to the general purposes of the charity or only to some specific purpose in connection with it, although this circumstance may be important in considering whether the endowment is exempt from the provisions of the Act in the case of a charity falling within the description in sect. 62.—p. 74.

LORD HOBHOUSE (for self, LORDS WATSON, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, DAVEY and SIR R. COUCH).—In the Hemsworth School Case the scheme complained of removed the site of the school from Hemsworth to Barnsley. A petition of appeal was presented by inhabitants of Hemsworth whose children were at the school. It was held that the inhabitants as such had no locus standi for appealing; they could only appeal in respect of some vested interests of their boys, and the vested interests saved by the [Endowed Schools] Act [1869], had been spent many years before. This decision accords in principle with the previous decisions in the case of Haydon Bridge School (Shaftoe's Charity, In re), and Sutton Coldfield School, and it is even more closely applicable to the present case. Indeed, so far as the facts of the present case constitute any distinction, they are less favourable to the right of appeal than those of the Hemsworth Case, for the removal of the school did affect the interests of the Hemsworth boys in a maternal sense, only it was not in the sense contemplated by the Act in sects 13 and 89. The argument, perhaps, was not presented as it has now been presented for the petitioners, but the decision clearly governs the present case.—p. 89.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—The rules to be collected from the cases are, as Hatherley, L.C. truly stated, clearly and precisely laid down by Lord St. Leonards in South Molton Corporation v. Att.-Gen. The only cases which have any bearing upon the present, are those where a testator, without expressing any general intention to devote his whole property to charity, has devised it, and required the devisee to give portions of it to certain charitable objects, not exhausting the whole estate, and has either left the residue or surplus undisposed of, or has appropriated it to an object which may or may not require the whole of it to be applied. In the former case . . . the devisee, according to Att.-Gen. v. Bristol Corporation (supra), will take the whole of the property subject to the specific appropriation. In the latter case . . . the question to whom it [the surplus or residue] belongs is one which depends entirely upon the construction of the instrument of gift, and the discovery of the intention of the testator may occasionally be not unattended with difficulty. . . . Att.-Gen. v. Cordwainers' Co. and Att.-Gen. v. Coopers' Co. are both of them distinguishable from the present case. In the case of the Cordwainers' Co. the M.R. held that the estate devised to the corporation was given to them absolutely, and was rather a gift upon condition than a gift upon trust. And in the case of the Coopers' Co. (which appears to have been somewhat doubted), the sum of three pounds given for the repairs of the houses devised to the company was represented to be an amount remaining after gifts of different objects, and was to be put into the common box of the company towards the reparation of the houses when need should be, imputing that it should go into the funds of the company and be mixed up with and become part of them. It seems to me very difficult to distinguish this case from Merchant Taylors' Co. v. Att.-Gen.—p. 428.

CAIRNS, L.C.—The C. A., as the authority for the view that the lease is voidable only, refers to what is stated as a principle of the decision and not a mere obiter dictum in Pennington v. Cardale. I cannot agree that it was any necessary part of the decision in Pennington v. Cardale, that the lease was voidable. The question in that case related to the meaning of the exception of certain premises out of a lease granted by a dean and chapter in 1849. The excepted premises were described as rents reserved in any building leases granted by the dean and chapter, and the Court held that these words, upon the whole context, meant leases which de facto had been granted by the dean and chapter, whether interests were lawfully created by them or not. The inquiry whether these leases were void or voidable was immaterial. It is true that in delivering the judgment of the Court, Martin, B. says of a lease granted by the dean and chapter contrary to the statute, "It seems quite clear from the authorities cited upon the argument that this lease was not void, but voidable only." These observations do not appear to me to have been necessary for the decision of the case; and, even if they were accurate, they did not relate to the effect of leases or grants by a corporation such as that of the appellants; but they referred to the class of cases relating to ecclesiastical corporations with a head, of which I have already spoken.—p. 334. If there was nothing more in the will than was stated in the report in the Weekly Notes, then, with all deference to the V.-C., for whose opinion he had the highest respect, his lordship would have been disposed to come to a different conclusion; but the words were not so strong as in the present case, and it might be that, if the whole will were before the Court, it would be found that the V.-C.'s opinion was well founded.—p. 490.

PEARSON, J.—One of the cases principally relied upon by Mr. Warrington was Williams v. Kershaw, which was decided by the then M.R. (I believe Lord Cottenham). There, the gift was "for such benevolent, charitable, and religious purposes, as they in their discretion shall think most advantageous and beneficial," and the M.R. says: "It was argued, in order to prove the gift to be good, that the terms must be taken conjointly; if so, every application must be to a religious purpose, which would no doubt, be benevolent, and, in a legal sense, charitable; but the question is, did the testator so consider it? Did he mean that there should be no application of any part of the residuary fund except to religious purposes? Such does not appear to me to be his intention; he intended to restrain the discretion of the trustees only within the limits of what was benevolent, or charitable, or religious. If this be the right construction, then the question is what the decisions have ascertained to be the rule on this subject?" Undoubtedly, if I am obliged to say that the proper construction of the present gift is "in charitable or deserving objects," the case would fall entirely within the reasoning of the M.R. in Williams v. Kershaw, and I should be compelled to hold that the gift was bad. But, to my mind, there is an entire difference between a gift to the three purposes, "benevolent, charitable, and religious," without any conjunction, copulative or disjunctive, between the first two adjectives, and the gift in the present case to "charitable and deserving" objects. I agree with the M.R. that "benevolent, charitable, and religious" means that the gift may be applied in any of those three ways. But when, as in the present case, the copulative conjunction connects the words "charitable and deserving," to my mind it changes the grammatical meaning altogether. The objects are to be at once charitable and deserving; and in that way the gift will be good.—p. 613.

KAY, J.—Lewis v. Allenby was a case in which the trustees had a discretion as to the distribution of the testator's residue, but the testator had given some indication of the mode in which he wished the discretion to be exercised, mentioning hospitals and other charitable institutions in England as some of the objects of his bounty, some of which institutions are exempted from the Mortmain Act and enabled to hold land, and it was held that the gift was valid, as being equivalent to a gift of the impure personality to charities by law enabled to take it. But in this case the gift is to the executors and trustees, to give to the poor as they may think fit.—p. 1081.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not myself quite follow the reasoning of Stuart, V.-C. in that case [Lewis v. Allenby], but we must consider that his decision has been acted upon, as it certainly has, and has been considered right from the time when it was pronounced almost until now—and I find it referred to in the standard text-books to which we are accustomed to look, without any comment—Lewin on Trusts, Jarman on Wills, and Theobald's Law of Wills. Speaking from my own recollection, I do not remember that it has been seriously contested. It has presented difficulties, and that is to my mind because the reasoning of the V.-C. is open to some comment; but it has certainly been acquiesced in and followed. I think the decisions of Pearson, J. in Oney, In re, Broadbent v. Barrow (col. 330), and of North, J. himself in Seton-Smith, In re, Bright-Smith v. Att.-Gen. (supra), are instances in point if any are required. But apart from those authorities I think that the real principle applicable to the case is that upon which Lord Hardwicke proceeded in Grimmett v. Grimmett, and the C. A. in Faversham Corporation v. Ryder, and Wood, V.-C. in Carter v. Green. That strikes me as good sense and not bad law. Applying those principles, I have come to the conclusion that there is nothing amiss with this gift to the trustees. What they will do with the fund is quite another matter. It is said that that view is opposed to two cases which unfortunately were not cited to Stuart, V.-C. when he decided Lewis v. Allenby—namely, Baker v. Sutton (supra, col. 323), and Johnston v. Swann, and unquestionably looking at the orders there made, and what was done, those decisions do appear to be opposed to the view taken by Stuart, V.-C.; but in neither of those cases was the precise point argued, and in neither does it appear what view the trustees took—whether they claimed the legacy and claimed the right to exercise the power, or whether they did not. Of course it is quite possible that in both cases the trustees may not have claimed the right at all, but left the Court to deal with the matter. If that is the true view, and is the explanation, as it may well be, of Johnston v. Swann and Baker v. Sutton, then they are not opposed to the view I am expressing. If they are, I am bound to say that upon principle I think the decision in Lewis v. Allenby is right, although, as I said before, I do not quite follow the reasoning of the V.-C. He seems to have construed the will as amounting to an exclusion of institutions which could not take mixed personality or the proceeds of the sale of realty. That is where I fail to follow him I do not think that that is the right view. I look upon the will here simply as conferring an ordinary power of appointment, which may be properly or improperly exercised, and until we know what the trustees do in the exercise of their power, we cannot say that the disposition conferring the power is bad.—p. 300.

RIGBY, F.J., who agreed, discussed also London University v. Yarron (supra, col. 323), and continued: It was decided upon this point, that where objects were pointed out some of which were illegal, with an alternative which would be legal, the power given to the trustees, their selection under which might include, and did, I suppose, in that case include, the legal objects, was quite sufficient to take the case out of the statute. That goes very much further than the cases, which are numerous, as to universities. It went to the question of whether the gift was valid, being for certain purposes, some of which would be valid and others invalid. . . . In Clark, In re, there was a plain object, for the poor as the trustees might think fit, and I think it very likely that that was quite a sufficient circumstance to distinguish that case in principle from the one that we are now deciding.—p. 301.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J. also discussed the cases.

HATHERLEY, L.C.—In that case [*Girdlestone v. BACON, V.-C.—The question, and the only question, before me is whether the doctrine of cy-près is to be applied to the present case. In my opinion there is no ground upon which that doctrine can be applied to this legacy. The rule stated in all the cases is, that where there is a general gift to general purposes of charity, that gift may be sustained on the doctrine of cy-près, although the particular objects fail, or are no longer in existence. Chamberlayne v. Brockett has been referred to as justifying the construction Mr. Millar sought to place upon this gift; but there the residue of the testatrix's estate was given for plain general charitable purposes, and it would have been against reason and against all the decisions to say that such a bequest as there was in that case was invalid, because no land had yet been obtained as indicated by the will. The judgment upon which Mr. Millar relies contains a plain and very distinct exposition of the law by Lord Selborne, who says: "If the gift in trust for charity is itself conditional upon a future and uncertain event, it is subject, in our judgment, to the same rules and principles as any other estate depending for its coming into existence upon a condition precedent. If this condition is never fulfilled the estate never arises; if it is so remote and indefinite as to transgress the limits of time prescribed by the rules of law against perpetuities, the gift fails ab initio." Words cannot be plainer than that.—p. 703.

JESSEL, M.R.—I quite agree to this, that if the first object is not so defined that you can reasonably ascertain the amount required, the whole must fail because you might then apply the whole of the gift to the first object; and therefore, if you could apply the whole of the income properly and fairly to the first object, there would, of course, be no ascertainable residue. And that appears to me to have been Chapman v. Brown, which I must say, with the greatest possible deference to three or four judges, does not appear to me to be overruled by Magistrates of Dundee v. Morris. In that case the H. L. thought there was sufficient limitation pointed out by the will as to the charitable object to enable them to ascertain the amount required for carrying out that object. But in Chapman v. Brown Sir W. Grant was of opinion that there was not enough to enable him to decide; and I must say, if it were not improper for me to express an opinion as between Wood, V.-C. and Sir W. Grant, that in my opinion Sir W. Grant was clearly right, namely, that there was not enough. The purpose in Chapman v. Brown was this. The testatrix gave the residue of her estate to executors "for the purpose of building or purchasing a chapel for the service of Almighty God." Now, could any human being say what would be reasonable for the purpose of building such a chapel? You might have any kind of chapel . . . there is no possible limitation, so that there was nothing at all to guide the Court, that I can find, in Chapman v. Brown; and there was nothing to prevent the whole of the residue from being applied to the building of the chapel. The executors had a discretion. . . . It appears to me, therefore, that there is nothing in the authority of Magistrates of Dundee v. Morris which at all interferes with Chapman v. Brown, the principle being, as I have said, that if you cannot fairly ascertain what is the extreme sum required for the first purpose, so that you may properly apply the whole property given to the first purpose, then of course, if the first purpose is void, the contingent surplus cannot be ascertained, and the whole gift fails. That being my opinion as to the case if it were untrammelled by any authorities, what do I find as regards authority? It is of the utmost importance, as regards our law, that judges of the first instance should not disregard a series of decisions by other judges of first instance, none of which have been appealed or have been otherwise interfered with. In Fisk v. Att.-Gen., in 1867, where there was a gift to an incumbent of a sum of stock upon trust, out of the dividends to apply such part thereof as should be required to keep in repair a family grave, and to apply the surplus for charity, Wood, V.-C. decided that, although the gift of the grave failed, yet the gift of the corpus was not affected, and the whole of the income was applicable to the charity. It may be difficult on principle to discover how he arrived at that conclusion, but he did arrive at it. The gift here in question is, to my mind, wholly undistinguishable from the gift there. I cannot find any possibility of fairly distinguishing it.—p. 379. And see post, col. 330.

STIRLING, J.—Undoubtedly there are many cases in which it has been decided that a gift to A. or B. is substitutional, and that conclusion has been arrived at more particularly in cases where the gift is in favour of "A. or his children." A typical example is Carey v. Carey, which was referred to in the argument, and which I have carefully considered since; but that case (and, as it appears to me, all the others which I have examined) was decided upon a consideration of the whole will, and all the circumstances which can be taken into consideration upon the construction of a will.—p. 557.

WICKENS, V.-C.—I have unwillingly come to the conclusion that I am bound by Att.-Gen. v. Price and Isaac v. Defriez, and that I must treat this as a charitable gift. It is remarkable that those cases do not appear to have been cited before Wigram, V.-C. in Liley v. Hay. . . In Isaac v. Defriez, the words, as they appear from the note in the other case, were these: "He gave the same unto his own and his then present wife, Dyffe Simpson's" poorest "relations." Not abstractedly poor, but "to be distributed and paid to them and such of them proportionably, share and share alike, at the discretion of his executors. In other words, to be divided equally amongst such persons as the trustees considered to be the poorest" relations. Every one of them might have had 10,000l. a year, and some might have had 20,000l. a year; then those who had the 10,000l. a year would have taken it. If the cases . . . had been cited before Wigram, V.-C. in Liley v. Hay, I should have followed the more recent decision. As it is, I am not entitled to dissent from authorities so much in point, and I must hold this bequest to be a charitable one.—p. 675.

JESSEL, M.R.—Upon that [the meaning of "poorest"] there really is authority; and the singular part of the matter is, that the authority which I am now going to quote [Isaac v. Defriez] was unfortunately—I cannot say misunderstood, because I cannot believe that the late Wickens, V.-C. misunderstood it—but probably overlooked by him: I think by some accident he must have trusted to memory instead of looking at the authority. . . . That is, the Court read the word "poorest" to mean "poor" or "very poor." The Court did not mean poorest in the sense of being least wealthy of a number of wealthy people (p. 760). Now, that is an entire mistake of the V.-C.'s. The decree in Isaac v. Defriez was only for poor relations, and the decree would not have comprised a person who had 10,000l. a year. . . . It [Gillam v. Taylor] is no authority at all, so far as that dictum is concerned, and is totally opposed to the whole theory of charity administration in this Court.—p. 752.

SIR M. SMITH (for self and JAMES, L.J., SIR B. PEACOCK and SIR R. COLLIER).—Apart, therefore, from the second article of the deed there would seem to be nothing in principle or in positive law to render such a gift as the present illegal as a gift in mortmain. The direction to the trustees to procure a charter or Act to incorporate a body empowered to hold the property and carry into effect the objects of the gift, necessarily implies a corroboration to be fulfilled previously to the vesting of the property; and the permission of the Crown to hold the lands would of necessity precede their acquisition by the corporation, and render it lawful. Commentators of high authority on French law have treated such dispositions apart from the edict as clearly good. . . . The same doctrine was sanctioned, and the grounds on which it rests were fully expounded by Lord Eldon in the case of Downing College, which in its circumstances bore some analogy to the present—*Att.-Gen. v. LINDLEY, M.R.—Great reliance was placed by the appellants on Att.-Gen. v. Calvert. The charity there was a pre-Reformation charity, and the Court had to decide how the endowment should be applied under circumstances never contemplated by the founder, but arising out of the change in the national religion effected by the Reformation. The judgment must be read with reference to the case with which the Court had to deal. We have no such problem to solve. Att.-Gen. v. Calvert does not assist us in construing the deed of endowment before us, nor justify us in holding that mere performance of the conditions contained in it entitles a person not a member of the Church of England to the benefit of the charity founded by that deed.—p. 71.

CHITTY, L.J.—An argument presented by counsel for the charity commissioners requires notice. They said broadly that no eleemosynary charity can be an "ecclesiastical charity" within the (Local Government) Act of 1894. I do not agree. . . . They referred to a passage in Lord Macnaghten's speech in Income Tax Commissioners v. Pemsel (supra, col. 324), in which charity in its legal sense was spoken of as comprising four principal divisions—trusts for the relief of poverty; trusts for the advancement of education; trusts for the advancement of religion; and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community not falling under the preceding heads. Lord Macnaghten was not there ranging charities into four distinct classes, each of which was exclusive of the others. It is plain that there may be a charity in the legal sense for purposes which are both eleemosynary and ecclesiastical or religious.—p. 73. V. WILLIAMS, L.J. concurred.

CRANWORTH, L.C.—That [Att.-Gen. v. Bowles] was a bequest to executors of a sum of 500l. to lay out a part in building a small schoolhouse, with a little house adjoining for the schoolmaster, the purchase of the ground and expenses of the building not to exceed 200l. Lord Hardwick held that the 200l. might be lawfully laid out in building upon lands belonging to, or which might belong to, the parish. I have not the least hesitation in saying that all the judges who have questioned this decision have questioned it upon the soundest ground. I am surprised that a judge of Lord Hardwick's extreme accuracy and knowledge of jurisprudence generally should have fallen into such an error as that. . . . That was undoubtedly a wrong decision, and it is declared to be so by Lord Northington, just ten years afterwards, in Att.-Gen. v.

Tyndall, where Lord Northington pointed out the error into which Lord Hardwick had fallen.
. . . . But Lord Northington, while triumphantly showing the error in Att.-Gen. v. Bowles, says.
"Building on a site is laying out the money in reality, and therefore contrary to the spirit of the statute. It is demandable in a propre, and is a purchase of so much reality." That has been entirely overruled in subsequent times.—p. 351.

LORD KINGSDOWN.—It appears to me extremely difficult to reconcile Att.-Gen. v. Hodg- son with the principles of former decisions or with the common understanding of mankind.
The testator gave money for a charity, which the law would not permit to take effect, and directed that "if no such institution could be conveniently established" the money should be applied to other charitable purposes not open to objection. The first charity could not be established at all, conveniently or inconveniently.
The condition, to use the words of Sir W. Grant in Murray v. Jones (1813) 2 V. & B. 313), if there was a condition, was more than performed.
The testator did not say, nor could he intend, that the gift over should take effect only in the event of the first gift being good in point of law, but also in the event of its being held to be subject to inconvenience in its execution. . . .
Philpott v. St. George's Hospital was founded on the decision in Att.-Gen. v. Hodgson. There was more to be said in favour of the decree in the former case than in the latter, because the particular events on which the gift over was to take effect were more distinctly specified. But I agree with the V.-C. in the opinion which he has expressed in his judgment in the present case, that the authority of those cases cannot be maintained consistently with the principles of former decisions.—p. 438.

LORD WENSLEYDALE, while not dissenting,

MALINS, V.-C.—This case was a very peculiar case, and I am of opinion that if the question ad turned on the construction of the first codicil he decision would have been the other way. It is perfectly clear that the reason on which the gift was made having failed, the conditional gift could not be good. Then came the second codicil, by which the testator made an absolute gift of the realty to one person, and an absolute gift of the personality to the charity to which he ad previously given the whole, stating, as a reason for the alteration in disposition, his having been advised that a gift of the realty would have been void under the Statute of Mortmain. This was a mistake, because the will was made before the Act of 9 Geo. 2, but the codicil was upheld. That does not reach this case, because here there is no complete alternative gift. I think, however, that if Att.-Gen. v. Lloyd had to be decided now, the decision would be the other way.—p. 211.

RIGBY, L.J.—In that case [Corcoran, In re], North, J. construed the will by saying that the securities were to be taken as they existed at a certain date—the date of the death of the tenant for life. That was the only gift that he had to deal with, and he treats it as if it were a gift of scheduled securities. The testator did not make such a gift; but he gave directions by which a schedule could have been made at the death of the tenant for life, and then he directs to be given to charities such part of his property as could be so given, and some of the investments at that time might, and some might not, be of a nature which could be so applied. What was said in the judgment was said in reference to that state of things—that is, a direction by the testator to transfer to charities certain definite securities. . . . Beaumont's Trusts is no more in favour of the respondents than Corcoran, In re. . . . The trustees of that will (of the original testatrix) were only responsible for the state of the property at the death of the tenant for life according to that will, and it was no concern of theirs how the will of the second testatrix was to be determined—that is to say, whether the property should come to her as pure or impure personality. She only gave what she could of the property coming to her under the former will, and that must be taken as the fund with which she was dealing. So understood, the decision was no doubt right; but that has nothing to do with the question here.—p. 820.

LORD HOBHOUSE (for self and EARL of SELBORNE, LORDS WATSON, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS and SHAND).—In that case [Att.-Gen. v. Mill] the testator was a native of Montrose. He spent many years in the Island of Carriacou, where he owned land and amassed a large fortune. He returned to Montrose, and stayed there about five years; then he came to England, and resided first in London and afterwards in Bath, up to his death in 1805, fourteen years afterwards. In 1791 he executed a will and a deed, by which he gave money to be invested in the purchase of land, ordering the income to be paid to certain Scotch trustees for the benefit of indigent ladies in Montrose. His will, with four codicils—all in English form—was proved in England. In his will and contemporaneous deed he described himself as of the Island of Carriacou, now residing in Marylebone. His codicils, it was stated at the bar, contained similar descriptions. His foreign assets were transmitted to England, and were administered under the direction of the Court of Chancery, and were the subject of a decree which paid no regard to the charitable gift. Subsequently an information was filed by the Att.-Gen. for the establishment of the charity by purchase of land in Scotland. It was held by Lord Lyndhurst, first in Chancery and afterwards in the H. L., that the testator must be taken to have directed the purchase of land in England, and that his gift contravened the mortmain laws, and was void. It is now argued that the testator was a domiciled Scotchman, and that the case decides that a bequest of money in a Scotch will directing the purchase of land in England for a charity is a void bequest. But the assumption that the testator had a Scotch domicile is not warranted by anything to be found in the reports. . . . For some reason—doubtless a sufficient one—it was the common ground of argument that the will was governed from first to last by English law. There is not a trace in the reported statements, arguments, or judgments that anybody asked what would be the effect of a will not governed by English law, which is the question now propounded to their lordships. It is time that Mr. J. Story (Conflict of Laws, sect. 446) and Mr. Westlake (Private International Law, sect. 165) both treat the decision as covering the case of a foreign will. But, on examining the case, that appears to their lordships to be a misapprehension of the point really decided. So far as they know, the present question is wholly untouched by authority.—p. 40.

JAMES, L.J.—There are some expressions in the judgment which I prepared in . . . Attree v. Hawe which seem to indicate that we thought the cases had gone to the extent of saying that no share in a partnership which had land for the purposes of the partnership, or real property, or impure personality, as part of the assets or capital, was hit by the statute of Geo. 2; that expression was not really applicable to anything we then had before us to decide; it was expressed rather too generally, and I may say, speaking for myself, inadvertently. . . . It certainly had been decided in Myers v. Perigal (supra, col. 340) and other cases of exactly the same character that shares in a joint-stock company, whether incorporated or unincorporated, which has land either as the substratum of its business, or other real assets at part of the assets of the business, are to be dealt with for the purposes of the statute as pure personal estate, but that is because they are to be treated just as if they were shares in a corporation, and they have always been held to be unaffected by the statute. The great distinction between that class of cases and the case of a private partnership is this, that in all those cases the intent and meaning of the partners is that the partnership, whether it be large or small, is to be in the nature of a corporation, they are all of them intended to have perpetual existence, and they are all intended to exist with fluctuating bodies of members from time to time, just like a corporation. Then no partner is ever supposed to have anything to do with the land except as one of the society through the machinery provided by the act or deed of settlement, and is never intended to have anything to do with the land in any shape or form except to get the profits from the land or the profits from the business of which the land is a part, and it is always intended that every share should pass in the market as a distinct thing, and in point of beneficial ownership wholly unconnected with the land or with the real assets of the partnership property of the company. That was the class of cases with respect to which the decision I have referred to was made. The principle which was established in Myers v. Perigal was applied by this Court in Attree v. Hawe to what is called debenture stock in railways.—p. 368.

BRETT, L.J.—Now, the authorities seem to me to have gone to this length, that although the devise to a charity is in terms of money only, and although the only thing which by the devise will come to that charity is money, yet if in order to effectuate the devise in favour of that charity it may be necessary to deal with an interest in land of the testator—the devise is within the Statute of Mortmain. It appears to me that the construction of that statute has been carried as far as that, and that Brook v. Badley (supra, col. 341), before Lord Cairns, cannot be supported, and cannot be faithfully followed unless it is a decision to the full effect of that proposition. The decision in Brook v. Badley seems to me virtually, and indeed intentionally, to overrule Marsh v. Att.-Gen. (supra, col. 340),

COTTON, L.J.—No doubt Marsh v. Att.-Gen. does seem to support the argument that as the testator could get nothing but money, although that money was to be produced by a sale of real estate, yet he could leave his interest such as it was to charity. But if that was the principle on which Marsh v. Att.-Gen. was decided, it was clearly inconsistent not only with the principle of the decision, but with the decision itself, of the L.C. in Brook v. Badley, and of course we are bound by that decision of the L.C. even although we did not think it right, which in my opinion it is. . . . Then how does the decision that the gift of a share in such a company as that in Nyers v. Perigal is not within the Act of Geo. 2 apply to such a case as this? There is the great distinction that the shares in that case from the constitution of the company were capable of being realised without winding up the concern, and therefore what the charity took was a share which it could sell in the market or might hold without any objection as to its being an interest in land, whereas, in the present case, the interest of the testator in this partnership property could only be realised by requiring the assets to be realised, that is, that this particular asset should be sold and a portion of the proceeds of sale paid to him. That involves, for the purpose of realising that which he gives to the charity, the necessity of dealing with land, and gives him, for the purposes of so dealing as to realise his interest, an interest or charge upon the land.—pp. 375, 376.

JAMES, L.J.—With regard to one thing that Cotton, L.J. has mentioned, I may say I do not consider the decision of a L.C. is absolutely binding upon us, because every L.C.'s decision was liable to be reheard not only by himself but by his successor, and there are instances known of it.—p. 377.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The C.A., in Alexander v. Brame, decided that the settlement of debts to charitable purposes did not avoid the statute: the H. L. never said the contrary, nor did any judge ever dissent from that proposition. So far from that, having read the case, it appears to me that we may take it as pretty well decided that a simple settlement of debts to charitable purposes does not come within the statute. The decision in the H. L. in Jeffries v. Alexander was, that what was there called a debt was not in substance a debt at all, but was the residue of a man's property, whatever he chose to make it amount to, after bequeathing legacies. The covenant in Jeffries v. Alexander was most extraordinary, as it amounted to this, that the settlor would leave property amounting to 60,000*l.*, after paying all his debts and legacies, to charitable purposes. . . . Foe v. Lownds is a case of a similar kind, and not like this, which is a case of a pure and simple covenant to pay 20,000*l.* . . . That [Brook v. Badley (supra, col. 341)] was a bequest of a legacy by the legatee to charitable purposes, and the legacy so bequeathed was treated by Lord Cairns as partly payable out of personality and partly out of real estate, and this was ascertained when the bequest to the charity took effect; so that the legacy bequeathed was not apportionable, and, therefore, the gifts failed.—p. 168.

COTTON, L.J.—Harris, In re, has really no bearing on the present case. Why? I was relied on by an expression by the late M.R. that the statute did not apply to an interest which did not directly affect land. To say that only a direct interest in land is hit by the statute, would contradict its terms, for it says nothing about the interest being direct. The distinction is that what is given is not an interest in land, merely because the donee may by some legal proceedings acquire an interest in land. An ordinary debt is not an interest in land, though the creditors can by proceedings at law attach the debtor's lands, and I think that the observations of the late M.R. were intended only to apply to such a case as that, the case of a gift of something which by itself gives no interest in land. The decision does not bear on the present case. The justices of the peace there had no power to seize the land or give any interest in it, but only to demand payment from certain persons. The fact that those persons could levy on the land thus sums which they were called upon to pay could not make those sums a charge upon or interest in land. In Tobson, In re, a debt was bequeathed, and at the time when it came to be enforced it had become payable out of land, but that did not alter its original character of a personal debt. None of these cases require an unnatural construction of the words of the statute. Here the question we have to answer is whether the testator's interest was an interest in land or not. It would be introducing too great a refinement to say that it was not. Brook v. Badley (supra, col. 341) is a strong case in favour of the respondent, for there it could not be said that the charity could have laid hold of any land. Lord Cairns there said that the question was whether what was given was an interest in or charge on land. The second point, whether the charity is not entitled to an apportionment, is a nice point, but it is covered by Drum v. Badley, and though sometimes a decision of the C. A. is overruled, this is only to be done with great caution. I think, however, that the decision in that case was right.—p. 952. BAGGALLAY and FRY, L.JJ. concurred.

COTTON, L.J.—As regards Knapp v. Williams, it may be said in the first place that it is not exactly known how it got to be where it is in the note, or who gave the report of it. The note is very short, and although it appears from the note that nothing was charged except the tolls paid on a turnpike road, it must not be forgotten that Lord St. Leonards stated in Myers v. Perigal (supra, col. 340) this: "Some of the authorities cited have gone considerable lengths, as, for instance, Knapp v. Williams, where there was the bequest of sums secured by a mortgage of turnpike tolls; but in that case it is to be observed that there was an actual assignment of the real property on which the tolls were secured; there was, therefore, something more than mere savouring of realty." If that was the fact, the decision could not have been otherwise, because, of course, a mortgage of land is undoubtedly an interest in land within the meaning of the statute. But we have not been able to find whether in fact that was so. Lindley, L.J. has looked at and I have looked at the passages in the Acts of 10 Geo. 1, c. vi., and 11 Geo. 2, c. vi., under which the mortgages were issued, but we have not been able to see the first Act, 3 Geo. 1. And although we do find that the trustees have power to deal with some land and real estate which was vested in them, we cannot find whether these mortgages did in fact comprise real estate, as Lord St. Leonards thought they did. But even if they comprised the tolls only, what did Lord Loughborough, in his judgment in Knapp v. Williams say? He said: "From the nature of the interest created by the Act, these tolls granted in perpetuity are certainly a hereditament; it is in its nature an interest affecting land." Now that shows the ground on which he arrived at that decision; and even if the mortgages did not in fact comprise real estate, yet it may be that the tolls were so connected with the land that, in the opinion of Lord Loughborough, they might be considered as an incorporeal hereditament connected with land, and therefore a hereditament within the meaning of the statute. But he goes on to say: "There is another species of tolls which gives no right at all in the land." He there points, in my opinion, to what the "duties" are in the present case. In that case Lord Loughborough considered that tolls for the use of a turnpike road, and toll-houses which were vested in trustees and were kept out of the tolls, were so far connected with the land as to be an incorporeal hereditament within the statute. But that does not apply to the present case, where the duties are of a very different nature. The connection between the right to receive the tolls, and the repairing and keeping up of the road in that case, was very different from the connection which there is in the present case between the right to receive the duties and the obligation which is thrown upon the Commissioners. Then there is Ion v. Ashton, where a bequest of a sum of money charged on the tolls of a harbour was held void under the Statute of Mortmain; but the M.R. expressly decided that question upon the authority of Knapp v. Williams. It may be added that the dock tolls in that case were so connected with the land as to come within Knapp v. Williams; but if they were not so connected, I think he was wrong in deciding that the case was governed by Knapp v. Williams.

... There is another case which I will refer to, because, although it does not directly bear on the question of what would come within the statute, yet it points to the distinction upon which, I think, this case ought to be decided—I mean Att.-Gen. v. Jones (supra, col. 340), where the question was whether a large sum of money which had been paid under an Act of Parliament for the purchase of the Skerries Lighthouse, and the profits arising from the tolls thereof was to be considered as arising from land or not. The Act directed that the money arising from the sale should be invested in land, and therefore it would retain its position of land if what it arose from was land. And it was held that the lighthouse had the tolls so attached to and dependent upon it that the whole must be considered together as real estate. The distinction pointed out in that case by the L.C., and which agreed with that stated by Bayley, J. in Rae v. Coke [(1826) 5 L. J. M. C. 8; 5 B. & C. 797], which was a question of how a lighthouse should be rated, was as follows: "The question then is, the house being clearly real property"—that is, the lighthouse—"for there is no doubt about that, whether the privilege of receiving tolls on condition of keeping up the light is not an incident or addition to the income and the profit arising from the house, or whether it is a totally distinct and independent franchise, which in that case would be personality and not realty." And he decided that, as this particular lighthouse had to be kept in repair, and the right to receive the tolls was only an incident to the lighthouse being kept up and being maintained by the person obtaining the tolls, the right to receive the tolls was inseparably connected with the title and use of the house, and they must be regarded as realty. But he points out that there might be merely a personal franchise not so connected with any land, nor with the use of any land, as to be simply personality.—p. 883. COTTERIDGE, C.J.—Now that case [Knapp v. Williams] has been certainly open to the observations that have been made upon it by several judges who noticed it, and especially by . . . Cotton, L.J. in Christmas, In re, in which he goes at some length into the case, and expresses his view upon the case, but which does not appear to me, on the present argument, to express any decided opinion. If Knapp v. Williams is binding upon us, then there seems to be clearly an end of this case, . . . because the apparent meaning of Knapp v. Williams—subject, I quite admit, to the difficulties pointed out by my learned brother in his commentary in Christmas, In re—was that bonds not distinguishable from those in the present case were held to be within the Statute of Mortmain. But the case is interesting because Lord Loughborough draws the distinction (a distinction which I suppose is perfectly well established) that there are two sorts of toll—that there is a toll so intimately connected with the possession of land, and so entirely bound up with land and arising out of land, that the mortgage or grant of such a toll would be within the Statute of Mortmain; and the other, a toll clearly severable from the possession of land, and not arising out of its possession, which would not be within the Statute of Mortmain.—p. 89.

COTTON, L.J.—That case [Gardner v. L. C. & D. Ry.] entirely differs from the present case; because here there is power to charge generally the undertaking of this harbour; but to do so in this manner is to charge—what was in the view of the legislature I do not know—the particular sums of money arising from that undertaking; and in the direction which is given as to the application of this general fund, which comprised, as Mr. Vaughan Hawkins pointed out, certain sums of money which came into the trustees' chest, the first direction is to pay the interest on these debentures, which is entirely different from the directions contained in the Railway Act, and entirely inconsistent with the views of the C. A. and which Turner, L.J. took, with reference to the directions contained in the Railway Acts. . . . In Christmas, In re, we came to the conclusion that the sum of money which was charged there was a sum of money in no way connected with the use of the land, that it was a sum to be paid by all the masters of ships who came within certain limits, not in any way using the land, and the payment was in no way connected with the use of the land. It could not be said, therefore, that the right to receive that was any interest in land.—pp. 91—92.

FRY, L.J.—Knapp v. Williams and Christmas, In re, have drawn and approved a distinction between two kinds of tolls, the one which is not connected with the land so as to make it an incorporeal hereditament; the other which is so connected with the land as to make it an incorporeal hereditament. Now, whether that distinction was rightly drawn in the particular case of Knapp v. Williams with regard to the particular tolls, is entirely immaterial for the purpose of our present inquiry. It is enough that the decisions which are binding upon us have drawn that distinction, and that compels us to inquire to which of the two kinds of tolls do the tolls in question belong.—p. 93.

STIRLING, J., after referring to the earlier cases, said: It is to be observed that in Walker v. Milne, Gardner v. L. C. & D. Ry., and Attree v. Howe all the judges rely on this—that a different construction of the security would enable the mortgagee to break up and destroy that which was intended by the legislature to be maintained as a going concern. The headnote to the report of Attree v. Howe [9 Ch. D. 337] says that Chandler v. Howell was overruled. It was not, however, expressly overruled; and the learned counsel for the appellants say in their argument: "Chandler v. Howell might well stand with a reversal of the present decision." The C. A. did, however, expressly approve the decision in Walker v. Milne; and it is, I think, to be inferred from the judgment that their lordships approved of the decision of Malins, V.-C. in Holds-worth v. Davenport. . . . As regards David, In re, it is to be observed that the mortgage there in question contained an assignment simply of the several rates, tolls, rents and other moneys arising and accruing by virtue of the Acts. There was no assignment of the undertaking nor anything equivalent to such an assignment; there was, therefore, wanting that which formed the basis of the judgments in Walker v. Milne, Gardner v. L. C. & D. Ry. and Attree v. Howe. It was held that under these circumstances the mortgage created a specific charge on certain tolls which formed part of the subject matter of the security.—p. 691.

KAY, J.—What Cotton, L.J. in effect says is, that the bond was one which, according to the true construction, charged merely the surplus of the borough fund after the other matters which had to be satisfied out of the fund were so satisfied. Whether all the reasoning in that case satisfies people's minds or not, of course this Court is bound by it in a similar case. Here there is not a charge on the borough fund or anything of the kind. The charge is on the city rate and the land of the corporation, as provided by the Act of Parliament. It is no answer to that to say, that there are certain things which are in the first instance to be paid out of the rents, which might or might not exhaust them.—p. 270. And see post, col. 350.

DAVEY, L.J.—I lay aside cases like Ashworth v. Mann (supra, col. 342), because those do not relate to the securities of a corporation of this description. Ashworth v. Mann related to the interest of a partner in a common law partnership, as to which different considerations arise. . . .

Taking this view of the case [that the debenture stock was a charge only on the fruits of the undertaking], it is unnecessary for us to express any decided opinion upon the point which was very much argued before us, whether Finch v. Squire (supra, col. 343) . . . has or has not been overruled, or, if it has not been overruled, whether it ought to be overruled. In the view which I have expressed of this case, I do not think that that question applies, because Finch v. Squire must be regarded as a case in the second category to which I have referred—namely, as a case in which there was a specific charge on specific property. But, as the point has been mentioned, I will just say this, that the reasoning of Sir W. Grant in Finch v. Squire seems to be of rather a refined character; and probably Finch v. Squire would not be decided as it was at the present day. On the other hand, I think it is scarcely right to say that it was overruled by Attree v. Howe, because, in my opinion, the decision in Attree v. Howe does not touch cases of the class represented by Finch v. Squire.—pp. 96–97.

KEKEWICH, J.—I venture to think that that case [Gardner v. L. C. & D. Ry.] is extremely important, but has been much misunderstood. The real meaning of that case in reference to this branch of the law is to be found in two or three words of Davey, L.J. in Pickard, in re (supra, col. 349), where he says: "They [that is, Turner, L.J. and Lord Cairns in Gardner v. L. C. & D. Ry.] in substance said this: 'Whatever may be the words used, it is a charge only on the fruits of the undertaking.' And that it is in effect precisely what Lord Cairns said in his celebrated judgment in Gardner v. L. C. & D. Ry., as to the fruit-bearing tree. . . . There was no charge on the land, and in fact Gardner v. L. C. & D. Ry. is a distinct decision, that the debentures were not a charge on the surplus land. Attree v. Howe, therefore, dealing with debenture stock, is not of so much value as otherwise it might be. . . . The case [Cluff v. Cluff] ought not to have been reported, because there was no argument; nor, so far as I can make out, was there any one there to argue on behalf of the Freeholders' Charities. I suppose that the learned judge and the learned counsel thought that the point was not worth serious argument, and therefore the charities were not served, or it may be that the charities had an opportunity of appearing, and did not think fit to appear. It is an unsatisfactory decision, but it is an expression of judicial opinion, and I find it thus cited in Tudor's Charitable Trusts (3rd ed.) at p. 409: "It has also been held that Metropolitan Board of Works Consolidated Stock cannot be bequeathed to a charity—Cluff v. Cluff." . . . I do not think that I could decline to follow that unless I were satisfied that it were wrong, and that there were other decisions inconsistent with it. But I turn to the decision of Kay, J. in Holmes, in re, Holmes v. Holmes (supra, col. 349). I do not think that is precisely the same case, or that it has a direct bearing, but still I think the substance of his judgment is in accordance with that of Hall, V.-C. in the other case. Attree v. Howe and Gardner v. L. C. & D. Ry. were cited to Kay, J., but he did not proceed upon either of those cases, but on the principle that it was a charge on land. That case seems to me to be against the view that I am asked to take, that this sum of stock is pure personality. Then, besides that, I have Hallett, in re, Howarth v. Massey, before North, J. I confess that, as that case is stated in the Times Law Reports, it seems to me to be inconsistent with the decision of North, J. himself, affirmed by the C. A. in Pickard, in re, but there the stock in question was Leicester Corporation Three-and-a-Half per cent. Redeemable Stock, apparently not being a direct charge on land except as being the property of a corporation; and North, J. held that he was bound by numerous cases to hold that it was a charge on the land.—p. 560.

The opinion of their lordships delivered by myself, immediately after the argument was closed, though it clearly expressed that the power was incidental to every legislative assembly, was not the only ground on which that judgment was rested, and, therefore, was in some degree extra-judicial; but besides, it was stated to be and was founded entirely on the dictum of Lord Ellenborough in Burdett v. Abbott [(1811) 14 East, 137. See "PARLIAMENT"], which dictum we all think cannot be taken as an authority for the abstract proposition, that every legislative body has the power of committing for contempt. The observation was made by his lordship, with reference to the peculiar powers of Parliament, and ought not, we all think, to be extended any further. We all think, therefore, that the opinion expressed by myself in Beaumont v. Barrett ought not to affect our decision in the present case, and there being no other authority on the subject, we decide according to the principle of the common law, that the House of Assembly have not the power contended for.—p. 91.

LORD SELBORNE (for self, LORDS BLACKBURN, MONKSWELL and HOBHOUSE and SIR R. COUCH).—The nature, grounds and limits of that power (which undoubtedly exists) [i.e., the inherent power in every colonial legislative assembly to protect itself against obstruction, interruption or disturbance of its proceedings by the misconduct of any of its members in the course of those proceedings] have been several times considered at this board, especially in Kielley v. Carson and Doyle v. Falconer. It results from those authorities that no powers of that kind are incident to or inherent in a colonial legislative assembly, without express grant, except, "such as are necessary to the existence of such a body, and the proper exercise of the functions it is intended to execute" [4 Moore P. C. 88]. Whatever, in a reasonable sense, is necessary for these purposes, is impliedly granted whenever any such legislative body is established by competent authority. For these purposes protective and self-defensive powers only, and not punitive, are necessary. If the question is to be elucidated by analogy, that analogy is rather to be derived from other assemblies, not legislative, whose incidental powers of self-protection are implied by the common law, although of inferior importance and dignity to bodies constituted for purposes of public legislation, than from the British Parliament, which has its own peculiar law and custom, or from Courts of record, which have also their special authorities and privileges recognised by law. "If a member of a Colonial House of Assembly is guilty of disorderly conduct in the House while sitting, he may be removed or excluded for a time, or even expelled . . . The right to remove for self-security is one thing, the right to inflict punishment is another. . . . If the good sense and conduct of the members of colonial legislatures prove insufficient to secure order and decency of debate, the law would sanction the use of that degree of that force which might be necessary to remove the person excluded from the place of meeting, and to keep him excluded." These words were used by Sir J. Colville, when delivering the judgment of this tribunal in Doyle v. Falconer, and their lordships adopt them. It does not, however, appear to be a just inference from the expressions "excluded for a time" and "to keep him excluded," that a power to exclude a member, and to keep him excluded for a length of time unlimited, or limited only by the discretion of the assembly, was considered in Doyle v. Falconer, or ought, on sound principles, to be now held by their lordships to be necessary to the existence of such a body or to the proper exercise of its functions.—p. 203.

HALSBURY, L.C. (for self, LORDS HERSHELL, WATSON, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, DAVEY and SIR R. COUCH).—The authorities summed up in Burdett v. Abbott, and followed in the case of the Sheriff of Middlesex [11 A. & E. 273], establish beyond all possibility of controversy the right of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom to protect itself against insult and violence by its own process without appealing to the ordinary Courts of law and without having its process interfered with by those Courts (p. 107). . . . No statute was there [Barton v. Taylor] relied on, but the legislative assembly itself in that case had, in pursuance of statutory powers, adopted certain standing rules or orders for the orderly conduct of the business of the assembly. The trespasses complained of were adjudged by this board not to be justifiable under the standing orders. It was then sought to justify the acts in question as being within a power incident to or inherent in a colonial legislative assembly. This Board refused to adopt that contention. . . . Their lordships are here dealing with a civil action, and they think it sufficient to say that the legislature could relieve members of the House from civil liability for acts done and words spoken in the House, whether they could or could not do so from liability to a criminal prosecution. No such question as that which arose in Barton v. Taylor arises here.—p. 109.

LORD FITZGERALD (for self, SIR B. PEACOCK, SIR R. COLLIER, SIR R. COUCH and SIR A. HOBHOUSE).—The appellants contended that the legislature of Ontario had no power to pass any Act to regulate the liquor traffic; that the whole power to pass such an Act was conferred on the Dominion Parliament, and consequently taken from the provincial legislature, by sect. 91 of the British North America Act, 1867; and that it did not come within any of the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the provincial legislatures by sect. 92. The class in sect. 91 which the Liquor Licence Act, 1877, was said to infringe was No. 2, "The Regulation of Trade and Commerce," and it was urged that the decision of this Board in Russell v. Reg. was conclusive that the whole subject of the liquor traffic was given to the Dominion Parliament, and consequently taken away from the provincial legislature. It appears to their lordships, however, that the decision of this tribunal in that case has not the effect supposed, and that, when properly considered, it should be taken rather as an authority in support of the judgment of the C. A. The sole question there was, whether it was competent to the Dominion Parliament, under its general powers to make laws for the peace, order and good government of the dominion, to pass the Canada Temperance Act, 1878, which was intended to be applicable to the several provinces of the dominion, or to such parts of the provinces as should locally adopt it. It was not doubted that the Dominion Parliament had such authority, under sect. 91, unless the subject fell within some one or more of the classes of subjects which by sect. 92 were assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces. It was in that case contended that the subject of the Temperance Act properly belonged to No. 13 of sect. 92, "Property and Civil Rights in the Province," which it was said belonged exclusively to the provincial legislature, and it was on what seems to be a misapprehension of some of the reasons of this Board in observing on that contention that the appellant's counsel principally relied. These observations should be interpreted according to the subject-matter to which they were intended to apply. Their lordships, in that case, after comparing the Temperance Act with laws relating to the sale of poisons, observe that "Laws of this nature designed for the promotion of public order, safety or morals, and which subject those who contravene them to criminal procedure and punishment, belong to the subject of public wrongs rather than to that of civil rights. They are of a nature which fall within the general authority of Parliament to make laws for the order and good government of Canada." And again: "What Parliament is dealing with in legislation of this kind is not a matter in relation to property and its rights, but one relating to public order and safety. That is the primary matter dealt with, and though incidentally the free use of things in which men may have property is interfered with, that incidental interference does not alter the character of the law." And their lordships' reasons on that part of the case are thus concluded: "The true nature and character of the legislation in the particular instance under discussion must always be determined, in order to ascertain the class of subjects to which it really belongs. In the present case it appears to their lordships, for the reasons already given, that the matter of the Act in question does not properly belong to the class of subjects 'Property and Civil Rights' within the meaning of sub-sect. 13." It appears to their lordships that Russell v. Reg., when properly understood, is not an authority in support of the appellant's contention, and their lordships do not intend to vary or depart from the reasons expressed for their judgment in that case. The principle which that case and Citizens' Insurance Co. v. Parsons illustrate is, that subjects which in one aspect and for one purpose fall within sect. 92, may in another aspect and for another purpose fall within sect. 91.—p. 5.

HALSBURY, L.C. (for self, LORDS WATSON and MACNAGHTEN, SIR E. FRY and SIR H. STRONG).—It was [there] decided that, although any direction of the provincial legislature to create new works on the railway and make a new drain and to alter its construction would be beyond the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, the railway company were not exempted from the municipal state of the law as it then existed, that all landowners, including the railway company, should clean out their ditches so as to prevent a nuisance. It is not necessary to do more here than to say that this case raises no such question anywhere near the line, because in this case there is the actual provision that there shall be a liability on the railway company, unless they create such and such works upon their roadway. That is manifestly and clearly beyond the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature.—p. 149.

SIR J. NAPIER (for self, SIR J. COLVILLE, SIR J. STUART and SIR M. SMITH).—The code, it is true, did not come into operation until the 1st of August, 1866, after the commencement of the action; but the articles referred to are declaratory, and in part, expressly founded on Brown v. Laurie, which was decided in 1851 by the Superior Court at Montreal, affirmed on appeal by the Court of Queen's Bench in 1854, and has since been considered to be the leading case on this branch of Canadian law. Mr. Lloyd contended that this authority, although binding on the Courts of Lower Canada, was open to review, and ought to be reviewed by this board. But their lordships are of opinion that a case decided so long ago by judges eminently conversant with the law of the country, and that has since been incorporated into the civil code, is not open to be reviewed on this appeal. . . . Their lordships are of opinion that Brown v. Laurie is a conclusive authority against the proposition that the work having been done according to the terms of the contract and under the superintendence of an architect selected by the employer, the builder is exempted from the liability which would otherwise attach to him. . . . It is important, moreover, to keep in mind that the authorities which exonerate the builder from responsibility for a breach of the warranty, when he acts under the guidance of an architect, are set aside by Brown v. Laurie, on account of the importance of protecting property and life, which

ROMILLY, M.B., after discussing the cases said: The effect therefore of these decisions is, as it appears to me, that though they have established that the letters-patent cannot create new ecclesiastical tribunals, or introduce into the colonies any of the ecclesiastical tribunals which subsist in this country, they have also established that every exercise of ecclesiastical authority, and every act of any member of the church in such colony professing to be a part of the Church of England, must in matters spiritual be governed by the laws of the Church of England, and must be tried by the application of those laws.—p. 24.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE (for self, LORD SELBORNE, SIR J. COLVILLE, SIR B. PEACOCK, SIR M. SMITH and SIR R. COLLIER).—In Long v. Cape Town (Bishop), their lordships said: "The Church of England, in places where there is no church established by law, is in the same situation with any other religious body—in no better, but in no worse position; and the members may adopt, as the members of any other communion may adopt, rules for enforcing discipline within their body which will be binding on those who, expressly or by implication, have assented to them. It may be further laid down that, where any religious, or other lawful association, has not only agreed on the terms of its union, but has also constituted a tribunal to determine whether the rules of the association have been violated by any of its members or not, and what shall be the consequences of such violation, the decision of such tribunal will be binding when it has acted within the scope of its authority, has observed such forms as the rules require, if any forms be prescribed, and, if not, has proceeded in a manner consonant with the principles of justice." Their lordships will bear in mind these principles in the judgment which they are about to pronounce.—p. 13.

COMPENSATION.

Bagg v. Montreal (Mayor) (1875) 19 Low. Can. Jur. 136, approved.

Morrison v. Montreal Corporation (1877) 47 L. J. P. C. 21; 3 App. Cas. 148.—P.C. SIR B. PEACOCK (for self, SIR J. COLVILLE, SIR M. SMITH and SIR R. COLLIER).—It was contended on behalf of the respondents that, in order to maintain an action upon the ground of error on the part of the commissioners in respect of the amount of the indemnity, it must be shown that the award of the commissioners was erroneous with reference to the evidence which was adduced before them. It has, however, been held in the C. A. in Canada in Bagg v. Montreal (Mayor), and also in the present case, one learned judge only dissenting, that whenever it can be shown that the commissioners have arrived at a wrong conclusion with respect to the value of the property or the amount of compensation, the party expropriated is entitled to maintain an action to obtain an augmentation of the indemnity. Their lordships are clearly of opinion that this is the proper construction of the statute.—p. 24.

Parkdale Corporation v. West (1887) 12 App. Cas. 602; 56 L. J. P. C. 66; 57 L. T. 602.—P.C. LORD MACNAGHTEN (for self, LORD ROBHOUSE, SIR B. PEACOCK and SIR R. COUGH.—Mr. Jeune . . . contended that their lordships were bound by that decision to hold that in the present case compensation was not a condition precedent. Their lordships consider that Jones v. Stanstead, &c. Ry. is not an authority for that contention. The circumstances of that case were very peculiar. The appellant, who was the plaintiff in the action, was the owner of a bridge over the river Richelieu, which had been built under the powers of an Act of Parliament, and had certain privileges and a sort of statutory monopoly within certain defined limits. Within those limits, under the powers of their Act, the railway company constructed a railway bridge: The plaintiff complained of the construction and use of the railway bridge as an invasion of his rights, and brought an action for the demolition of that bridge, which was said to be the proper mode of claiming damages in such a case. On appeal the plaintiff's case was mainly founded on the authority of Reg. v. Cunliffe Ry. [(1871) 40 L. J. Q. B. 169; L. R. 6 Q. B. 422. See "LANDS CLAUSES ACT"] which was supposed to be distinguishable from Hammer Smith Ry. v.

Brand [(1869) 38 L. J. Q. B. 265; L. R. 4 H. L. 171. See "RAILWAY"], but which was afterwards overruled in Hopkins v. G. N. Ry. [(1877) 46 L. J. Q. B. 265; 2 Q. B. D. 224. See "LANDS CLAUSES ACT"]. . . . It was pointed out in the judgment that it was not the construction of the railway bridge, but the use of it when constructed for the conveyance of traffic, which injuriously affected the privilege of the appellant, and gave him, if at all, the right to compensation, and their lordships expressed their opinion that it was not a reasonable construction of the statute under consideration to imply as a condition precedent that compensation must be paid for such consequential injuries before doing the work. And the appeal was consequently dismissed. Their lordships do not consider that this decision conflicts with the opinion they have expressed in the present case.—pp. 614, 615.

Tooth v. Power (1891) 60 L. J. P. C. 39; [1891] A. C. 284; 64 L. T. 698.—P.C.

LORD WATSON (for self, HALSBURY, L.C., LORDS HOBHOUSE, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS AND FIELD).—Their lordships do not doubt that under those enactments [Crown Lands Alienation Act, 1861, and Lands Acts Amendment Act, 1875,] an infant of maturer years might personally apply for and complete a conditional purchase of Crown land. Nor do they question the authority of the colonial cases which were before this Board in O'Shanassy v. Joachim, in which very young children were held to have become purchasers, they residing with their parents upon the selection, and the parent making improvements and paying the purchase-money by way of advancement to them. It is quite consonant with legal principle that what is done in the name and in the interest of an infant by one who stands in loco parentis shall be held to have been done by the infant himself, so as to constitute compliance with the Act sufficient to create a valid interest in him; but it does not follow that what is done by a stranger, in name of an infant, for his own behoof, and with no intention of benefiting the infant, can be regarded as fulfilment by the latter of the statutory conditions. . . . The circumstances of the present case differ so widely from the facts with which this Board had to deal in Barton v. Muir as to render it unnecessary to enter upon a critical examination of the reasons assigned for its decision. In that case the defendant was of full age, and all the conditions prescribed by the Act were performed by him voluntarily and personally, and not by another individual under cover of his name. Their lordships think it right to add that although, for obvious reasons, Barton v. Muir was relied on as an authority absolutely binding upon them by both parties at the bar, yet it would have been their duty had the necessity arisen, to consider for themselves whether the decision is one which they ought to follow. It was given ex parte; and that being the case, although great weight is due to the decision of this Board, their lordships are "at liberty to examine the reasons upon which that decision was arrived at, and if they should find themselves forced to dissent from these reasons, to decide upon their own view of the law." These are the words used by Earl Cairns when delivering the judgment of the Board in Ridsdale v. Clifton [(1877) 46 L. J. P. C. 27; 2 P. D. 276. See "ECCLESIASTICAL LAW"], which contains a full exposition of the law upon this point.—p. 43.

SIR M. SMITH (for self, SIR J. COLVILLE AND SIR R. COLLIER).—Considering, then, that this ordinance enacts a new law on the point in question, it would not be of force in Canada unless it had been registered there. The appellants' counsel relied on the injunction of the ordinance requiring it to be obeyed "dans tout notre royaume, terres et pays de notre obéissance;" but a Royal Ordinance, published after the establishment of "Le Conseil Supérieur" in Canada by the Edict of 1663, did not take effect in that province, proprio rigore, until it was registered: *Hutchinson v. HERSCHLIL, L.C. (for self, LORDS WATSON, MACNAGHTEN and SHAND).—In Barrett's Case the sole question raised was whether the Public Schools Act of 1890 prejudicially affected any right or privilege which the Roman Catholics by law or practice had in the province at the union. Their lordships arrived at the conclusion that this question must be answered in the negative. The only right or privilege which the Roman Catholics then possessed, either by law or practice, was the right or privilege of establishing and maintaining for the use of members of their own Church such schools as they pleased. It appeared to their lordships that this right or privilege remained untouched, and therefore could not be said to be affected by the legislation of 1890.—p. 76.

SIR B. PEACOCK (for self, LORD HOBHOUSE, SIR R. BAGGALLAY and SIR R. COUCH).—Reference was also made by the learned judges below to some observations which were made in the Ceylon case of Appu v. Queen's Advocate, as if they were intended to lay down a universal principle that actions ex delicto cannot be brought against the Crown. But their lordships were speaking solely with reference to the law of Ceylon, as to which every one was agreed that there existed no practice of suing the Crown on torts, whereas there did exist a practice of suing on contracts. It was argued that certain words in an ordinance were to be excluded from application to any kind of suit by a subject against the Crown, because they were capable of application to actions on tort, which did not exist. It was in answering that argument that their lordships' observations were made, and it has no bearing whatever on the present controversy.—p. 76.

Straits Settlement Att.-Gen. v. Wemyss (1888) 57 L. J. P. C. 62; 13 App. Cas. 192; 58 L. T. 358.—P.C.

LORD HOBHOUSE (for self, LORDS WATSON, FITZGERALD, and MACNAGHTEN and SIR B. PEACOCK).—In Farnell v. Bowman attention was directed by this committee to the fact that in many colonies the Crown was in the habit of undertaking works which in England are usually performed by private persons, and to the consequent expediency of providing remedies for injuries committed in the course of these works. The present case is an illustration of that remark. And there is no improbability, but the reverse, that when the legislature of a colony in such circumstances allows claims against the Crown in words applicable to claims upon torts, it should mean exactly what it expresses.—p. 64.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE (for self, LORD HATHERLEY, SIR J. COLVILLE, SIR B. PEACOCK, SIR M. SMITH and SIR R. COLLIER).—After this decision [Ex parte Renouf], it became impossible to deny that for certain purposes the consent of the parishioners was necessary, at all events in parishes in which there was not a custom to the contrary. But the principle upon which the decision is founded is important. It is clearly to the effect that in all questions of grave consequence affecting their parish the parishioners have a right to be consulted. This appears to their lordships to be the true doctrine derived from the reason of the thing and to be supported by the general analogies of the law relating to commons.—p. 38.

SCIRE FACIAS.

LORD CHELMSFORD (for self, SIR J. COLVILLE and SIR E. V. WILLIAMS).—In the argument for the appellant, Reg. v. Clarke was relied upon. That was a proceeding in scire facias to annul a grant of Crown lands in New Zealand, where the judicial committee upon appeal recommended that judgment should be entered for the Crown. This, it was insisted, is an express decision that scire facias will lie although there is no record. In the judgment of the learned Chief Justice of the Supreme Court the case is treated as a conclusive authority in favour of the promoters of the scire facias. But it appears to their lordships that it cannot be properly regarded as a determination of the question. From the beginning to the end of that case there was nothing to raise any doubt as to the propriety of the proceeding by scire facias. No objection was taken to it in the colony. Not the slightest suggestion was offered upon the subject in the course of the argument upon the appeal. The hearing before the judicial committee was ex parte, the respondent not having appeared, and the attention of their lordships was not in any way called to the irregularity of the proceeding, in the validity of which they are supposed by their silence to have acquiesced. Even if the point occurred to their own minds they might very fairly have inferred, from the absence of all objection in the Supreme Court of New Zealand, that the proceeding by scire facias to annul grants of Crown land was proper in that colony, either from the grants being made records of the Court or from the judges having power to make rules as to the form and manner of proceeding, and having authorised the process of scire facias in the case of Crown grants.—p. 29.

SIR R. COLLIER (for self, SIR J. COLVILLE, SIR B. PEACOCK and SIR M. SMITH).—The Supreme Court [of Ceylon] appear to have assumed that the mutual will of Don Adrian and Cornelia "spoke" from the death of the first dying, and that, even if Cornelia might, after the death of her husband, have revoked it, yet, as she did not, it operated from that date upon the whole of the joint property. Their lordships cannot assent to this view. A mutual will is, as was pointed out by this Board in Denysen v. Mostert, in effect two wills, the disposition of each sharer being applicable to his or her half of the joint property.—p. 52.

SIR B. PEACOCK (for self, LORDS WATSON, MONKSWELL and HOBHOUSE and SIR R. COUCH).—The doctrine of the English Courts of equity as to illusory or unsubstantial appointments under a power is not, and never was, any part of the old French law or of the law of Lower Canada, nor is it included in any of the Acts of chapter 4 of the Civil Code of Canada relating to substitutions. The question whether John could exclude any one of his children from a share must, in their lordships' opinion, be decided according to the law of Lower Canada, and not according to the English law. They do not understand Martin v. Lee as deciding that a will executed in Lower Canada by a person domiciled in Lower Canada, if written in English, must be interpreted with regard either to movable or immovable property in Lower Canada, according to the rules of English law, and have the same effect given to the phraseology as if that phraseology had been contained in a will executed in England by a person domiciled in England, or relating to land or other property in England. All that they understand that case to decide is that the word "children," used as it was in the will then to be interpreted, was not intended to have the more extensive meaning which may sometimes be given to the word "enfants" in the old French law. . . . It could never have been intended by their lordships to lay down a rule of construction which might render it necessary to apply the rule in Shelley's Case [(1811) 1 Co. Rep. 93] to a conveyance or devise written in the English language of lands in Lower Canada to a man for life, with a substitution "in favour of his heirs upon his death."—p. 4

Reg. v. Alloo Paroo (1847) 5 Moore P. C. 296.
LORD BROUQHAM (for self, LORD LANGDALE, DR. LUSHINGTON and T. PEMBERTON LEIGH).—Christian v. Corren, from the Isle of Man, really proves nothing. The argument is the argument of Mr. Peere Williams himself, for it is not the judgment of the Court. No doubt Peere Williams is a great authority as a reporter, a very learned person, and I believe a very accurate reporter he is generally allowed to be; but what he says there is no part of the judgment of the Court. He says, even if there be express words in the charter, excluding the right of the subject, those words shall not be held to deprive the subject of his common law right of appeal to the Crown, in order that justice may not fail. The Court, which was assisted in that case by Parker, C.J., in giving their judgment, proceeds upon no such ground. They only say, in this case there is nothing to take away the general right of appeal, which is necessary to prevent a failure of justice. And Parker, C.J., in that case, observes that the Court of Chancery, even in the case of a proceeding of a copyhold Court, if anything were done against good conscience, would review it, and would direct that the Court should re-assemble for the purpose of acting more conscientiously. But it is certain that that case was not borne out by the judgment of the Court of Chancery, when an attempt was made in a case before Lord Jeffries, L.C. which had been very much considered at the Rolls by Mr. Sergeant Trevor, who was then M.R., and where such a power to interfere was wholly denied. Ash v. Rogie ((1685) 1 Vern. 367). It is quite unnecessary, however, to enter into that, because it is quite sufficient to observe, that the L.C.J., in granting that right of appeal which has been contended against, does not in the slightest degree bear out the generality of Mr. Peere Williams's argument.—p. 302.

SIR M. SMITH (for self, SIR J. COLVILLE, SIR B. PEACOCK and SIR R. COLLIER).—The question in Cuvillier v. Ayiwin arose upon the Lower Canada Colonial Act (34 Geo. 3, c. 6), which enacted that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be final in all cases under the value of 500*l.*, and an application for special leave to appeal in a case under that value was refused by a committee of the Privy Council. The remarks attributed to the M.R. in his judgment rejecting the petition are directed to one aspect only of the question—namely, the power of the Crown with the other branches of the legislature to deprive the subject of one of his rights. No allusion was made to the principle that express words are necessary to take away the prerogative rights of the Crown, nor to the provision contained in the statute itself, that nothing therein contained should derogate from any right or prerogative of the Crown. This case, moreover, if not expressly overruled, has not been followed, and later decisions are opposed to it. In Marois, In re (supra), upon an application for leave to appeal from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, Lord Chelmsford, in giving the judgment of this Committee, after stating that in Cuvillier v. Ayiwin the very point was decided against the petitioner, said: "If the question is to be concluded by that decision, this petition must be at once dismissed, but upon turning to the report of the case, their lordships are not satisfied that the subject received that full and deliberate consideration which the great importance of it demanded. The report of the judgment of the M.B. is contained in a few lines; and he does not appear to have directly adverted to the effect of the proviso contained in the 43rd section of the Act on the prerogative of the Crown." Leave to appeal was granted in that case, subject to the risk of a petition being presented to dismiss the appeal as incompetent. Although their lordships, in granting this leave, said that they desired to intimate no opinion whether the decision in Cuivillier v. Aylwin could be sustained or not, it is obvious that, at the least, they regard it as being open to review. In Johnston v. St. Andrew's Church, Montreal, upon an application for special leave to appeal against a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, the effect of the 47th section of the Act establishing that Court, which enacted that its judgment should be final and conclusive, saving any right which her Majesty may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of her royal prerogative, came in question, and the L.C. in giving the judgment of this Committee, said: "Their lordships have no doubt whatever that assuming, as the petitioners do assume, that their power of appeal as a master of right is not continued, still that her Majesty's prerogative to allow an appeal, if so advised, is left entirely untouched and preserved by this section." Although leave to appeal was in this instance refused, on the ground that the case was not a proper one for the exercise of the prerogative, the opinion cited above is virtually opposed to the decision in Cuivillier v. Aylwin, where, it is to be remembered, the Act in question likewise contained a saving of the prerogative of the Crown. . . . It [Théberge v. Landry] was an application for special leave to appeal against a judgment of the superior Court of Quebec, upon an election petition, by which the applicant had been unseated by corrupt practices. By the Quebec Controversed Elections Act, 1875, the decision of controverted elections, which formerly belonged to the legislative assembly itself, was conferred upon the superior Court, and by sect. 90 of the Act it was enacted that the judgment of that Court sitting in review should not be susceptible of appeal. It was held by this Committee that there was no prerogative right in the Crown to review the judgment of the superior Court upon an election petition, and the application was refused. This decision turned on the peculiar nature of the jurisdiction delegated to the superior Court, and not merely on the prohibitory words of the statute. It was distinctly and carefully rested on the ground of the peculiarity of the subject-matter, which concerned not merely ordinary civil rights, but rights and privileges always regarded as pertaining to the legislative assembly, in complete independence of the Crown, so far as they properly existed; and consequently it was held that, in transferring the decision of these rights from the assembly to the superior Court, it could not have been intended that the determination in the last resort should belong to the Queen in Council.—pp. 66, 67.

*Kennedy v. Purcell (1888) 59 L. T. 279.—P.C. LORD HOBHOUSE (for self, LORD MACNAGHTEN, SIR B. PEACOCK and SIR R. COUCH).—Their lordships do not think that, for the present purpose, any useful or substantial distinction can be taken between the statutes which were respectively the subjects of discussion in Théberge v. Landry and Valin v. Langlois and those which are now in question. In all three cases there is the broad consideration of the inconvenience of the Crown interfering in election matters, and the unlikelihood that the colonial legislature should have intended any such result. In all three there is the creation of a special tribunal for the trials of petitions in the sense that the litigation was not left to follow the course of an ordinary lawsuit, but subjected to a special procedure and limitations of its own, and in all three there is the same expressions of the intention to make the colonial decision final. But such variance as there is between the two cited cases is only to this extent—that the Committee in the latter case must have thought that the question of the existence of the prerogative was still susceptible of argument, when the dispute went to the very root of the validity of a law passed by Parliament to take effect in a province. Their opinion on an ex parte hearing, and on the sole question whether or not there should be any further argument on the matter at all, cannot be put higher than that.—p. 280.*

LORD WATSON (for self, LORD HOBHOUSE, SIR B. PEACOCK and SIR R. The cases in which that may be competently done are explained by Lord Bringham in Rajunder Narian Rae v. Bijai Govind Sing. His lordship properly describes this privilege, when allowed, not as a right, but as an indulgence. At p. 184 of the first volume of Moore's Reports, his lordship says: "It is impossible to doubt that the indulgence extended in such cases is mainly owing to the natural desire prevailing to prevent irremediable injustice being done by a Court of the last resort, where, by some accident, without any blame, the party has not been heard, and an order has been inadvertently made as if the party had been heard."—p. 663.

PROFIT A PRENDRE.

Chilton v. London Corporation (1878) 7 Ch. D. 735; 47 L. J. Ch. 433; 38 L. T. 49; 26 W. R. 474.

JESSEL, M.R.—The right which Lord Touliday allowed in that case, which was heard on demurrer, was not a right in the inhabitants for their own benefit, but a right in the inhabitants as a corporation for the benefit of the poor of the parish, the right having been created by an alleged Crown grant, which was admitted for the purposes of the demurrer; but there is no such grant alleged here (p. 735). . . . Being therefore driven to see what Willingle v. Maitland decided—without attempting for a moment to say that I can or that I should wish to overrule it, it being decided by my predecessor in the year 1866—I must see what it did decide. Now what it decided was this, that a Crown grant to the inhabitants of a parish to take certain profits à prendre out of a royal manor was valid; and that the effect of the grant was to incorporate the inhabitants for the purpose of enabling them to exercise the rights. This is all Willingle v. Maitland decided.—p. 741.

Rivers (Lord) v. Adams (1878) 48 L. J. Ex. 47; 3 Ex. D. 361; 39 L. T. 39; 27 W. R. 381.

KELLY, C.B. (for the Court).—But the right claimed is a profit à prendre in the soil of another, and the authorities are uniform, from Gateward's Case to Chilton v. London Corporation, that such a custom is bad in law. See Salby v. Robinson [(1788) 2 Term Rep. 758] and Constable v. Nicholson; where other authorities are given. Many sound reasons are given in the authorities for this conclusion. It is only necessary to advert to some of those given in Gateward's Case. . . . That was not a case in which the inhabitants of a certain village generally claimed a profit à prendre, but the plea alleged that, by custom, all persons inhabiting any ancient messuages should, by virtue of their inhabitation, have a certain right of common. It was adjudged by all the justices that such custom was against law for several reasons. . . . The judgment in Constable v. Nicholson is correctly given in the headnote in the Law Journal Reports (except in the use by mistake of the word "easement" for "right") (p. 49). . . . We were much pressed on behalf of the defendants with Willingale v. Maitland, but when that case is examined it has no bearing upon the exact question which is raised in the present case. . . . It is to be noticed that nothing whatever was granted to the inhabitants, neither land nor privilege of any sort: the only grant to the inhabitants was that the labouring poor should have the privilege as alleged, and under a grant from the Crown they may become a corporation, and ought to act as such for the purpose of performing this charitable trust. In the present case we are not dealing with a trust to be performed for the benefit of a limited body, but with the right of the inhabitants generally, and the case renders no assistance in considering without a grant to the inhabitants generally what ought to be presumed from user. The subsequent case of Chilton v. London Corporation . . . should be read in connection with the above case.—pp. 50, 51.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self, COTTON and BOWEN, L.J.).—Had it not been for the decision of the H. L. in Goodman v. Saltash (Mayor) we should have felt great difficulty in holding this trust to be a charitable trust. For, although the occupiers of these cottages may have been, and probably were, poor people, the trust is not for the poor occupiers, but for all the then and future occupiers, whether poor or not. Moreover, the trust is not for the inhabitants of a parish or district, but only for some of such persons. The trust is for a comparatively small and tolerably well-defined class of persons. The class consists of all the then and future occupiers of the cottages; and there may be several occupiers of one cottage. The class, however, though limited, is, as to its members, uncertain, and is liable to fluctuation, and the trust for the class is perpetual. This being the case, we are unable to distinguish this case from the trust which both Lord Selborne and Lord Cairns held to be a charitable trust, and therefore valid, in Goodman v. Saltash (Mayor).—p. 569.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—There [Att.-Gen. v. Meyrick] lands, which originally belonged to the lord of the manor were allotted to him as trustee for the commoners. A railway having taken the land the question was as to the application of the purchase-money which was paid into Court. The H. L. held . . . that the lord of the manor held the land which had been allotted to him upon a trust, and that trust not exhausting the beneficial interest in the land, subject to it the lord had the beneficial interest. The grounds of the decision are concisely summed up by Lord Watson, who said: "Having regard to the position of these parties, and the intention of the legislature as appearing from the language of the Act, I am satisfied that the trust created by sect. 13 does not take away the whole beneficial interest of the lord of the manor, but merely constitutes a right of turbarry as a burden upon that in trust."—p. 562.

RIGBY, L.J.—In Att.-Gen. v. Meyrick, so far from the legal estate being taken away from the lord, the land in question, which originally belonged to him, was allotted to him on trust to allow the same to be used as a turf common for the occupiers of certain cottages, who, being a fluctuating body, were not capable of taking a conveyance of any interest in the lands. So also in Reg. v. Inclosure Commissioners the legal estate in the land in question clearly remained vested in the lord of the manor. . . . In this case the question is in whom the legal estate is vested.—p. 563. V. WILLIAMS, L.J. concurred.

BLACKBURN, J.—In Hall v. Harding cattle of a commoner had been distrained damage feasant by another commoner, and it was alleged that the owner of the cattle distrained had surcharged by putting on an excessive number of cattle; it was held that the distress could not be maintained, because a commoner must not take the remedy into his own hands where the cattle are on the common under a colour of right. At the end of the judgment the Court stated that "upon the whole the right of distress seemed to turn upon this, that wherever there is a colour of right for putting in the cattle, a commoner cannot distrain, because it would be judging for himself in a question that depends upon a more competent inquiry. But where the cattle are put upon the common without any colour or pretence of right, the commoner may distrain them, and therefore he may distrain the cattle of a stranger." We think this doctrine binding upon us.—p. 274.

CHITTY, J.—The respondents rely on Perry v. Fitzhove as showing conclusively that where a house is inhabited, as these houses are, the right of abatement does not exist; but though Perry v. Fitzhove at first sight also appears to be an authority for such a proposition, yet it is certain that in Davies v. Williams (where some of the same judges who decided Perry v. Fitzhove were again present) it was decided that the right to pull down a house which was a nuisance by obstructing a common right of common does exist, notwithstanding the fact that the house was inhabited, where, before proceeding to exercise the common law right of abatement, the commoner had given proper notice to those in the house, and had requested them to remove it; and the judgment there says that the case was distinguishable from Perry v. Fitzhove on the ground of notice and request to the occupier, and that there was nothing to take the case out of the general rule that a commoner may pull down a building wrongfully erected upon the common, and which prevents his exercising his right as fully as he might otherwise, provided he does no unnecessary damage. . . . Another point argued for the respondents was, that there cannot be any right of abatement in the existing circumstances, because the applicants failed to obtain a mandatory injunction; and for that they referred to Baten's Case, the substance of which is, that if a party aggrieved has himself abated the nuisance, he could not have the actions which he then might have brought for the purpose of obtaining an abatement through the medium of the Court; and it was said to follow from this, that if the Court had refused the remedy in the first instance, then the right to abate did not exist. I leave that point open, and only add that I am not satisfied that this inversion of the proposition as stated in Baten's Case is justified according to law, and though I do not mean to prejudice it, I will merely say that the reason given in the report of Baten's Case why, after abatement, a man shall not pursue his remedy by writ, is that the nuisance, when it is abated, is gone; but where the Court has declined to apply the special equitable remedy of a mandatory injunction, it does not follow as a mere matter of course that the right to abatement is gone. I leave that question unprejudiced, that it may be discussed in the right way and at the right time.—p. 57.

PRY, L.J. (for self, COTTON and BOWEN, L.J.J.).—This is an action on behalf of all the commoners. The measure of the common which should be left for all ought, we think, according to sound reason, to be that amount which will be sufficient for the enjoyment of all then existing rights, if such rights are to be fully enjoyed. . . . But two cases were pressed upon us as inconsistent with this conclusion. One was Lake v. Plaxton, where it was held that the right of the Crown to turn deer on the waste did not form an element for the consideration of the jury on a question of sufficiency of common in a case where no deer had been turned on the waste for upwards of twenty years. The ground of this decision is not very clearly stated in the judgment: it may, perhaps, have turned on the peculiar nature of the Crown right. If otherwise, the case is one which may require further consideration. In Lascelles v. Ouslow (Lord) the Court held that the fact that, notwithstanding the inclosures complained of, there had been sufficient pasture for the average number of animals which had for the last ten years at least been turned out, was evidence that the inclosures had not interfered with the rights of the commoners. The case, perhaps, proceeds upon the view that in the absence of any other evidence, the actual user of the common for the last ten years might be regarded as some evidence of the extent of the rights of the commoners, and in that point of view the case may be correct. But some of the language or reasoning in the judgment appears to us open to criticism, and if the case goes beyond the view above suggested, we doubt whether it can be maintained. Neither of these cases was determined in the C. A., and there appears to be no earlier precedent for the novelty which, according to the argument of the appellants, has been introduced into the law of common by these cases.—p. 566.

FRY, J.—With regard to the digging of gravel, it is said that that is not within the Statute of

assuming that to be so, and very probably the plaintiff is right in that contention, it remains to be considered whether the lord may not dig gravel, provided he does not interfere with the substantial rights of the commoners. Now that point has been the subject of adjudication. It has been dealt with by Hall, V.-C. in Hall v.

Byron. The V.-C. then laid down the law thus:

"The law I consider to be that the lord may take gravel, marl, loam, and the like, in the waste, so long as he does not infringe upon the commoners'

rights, his right so to do being quite independent of the right of approvement under the Statute of Merton or at common law, and existing by reason of his ownership of the soil, subject only to the interests of the commoners. Bayley, J., in Arlett

v. Ellis, said, 'The lord has rights of his own reserved upon the waste; I do not say subservient to, but concurrent with, the rights of the commoners. He has a right to stock the common, and to every benefit to be derived from the soil, not inconsistent with the rights of commoners. And, when it is ascertained that there is more common than is necessary for the cattle of the commoners, the lord, as it seems to me, is

James, L.J., seems to have taken the same view.

There is, further, Filewood v. Palmer, which seems to show that Lord King, the L.C. of that day, took the same view with regard to the rights of the lord as to digging for brick-earth. Undoubtedly there is an obiter dictum of Windham,

J. in Geo v. Cutler, where he says: "The lord may not dig pits in the common into which the

a mere obiter dictum, and is to be found only in Siderfin's Report, and not in any other report of the case.—p. 831.

November, 1866, which demises "all their"

as it is there marked out and described by its

first inquiry is this, by what principle ought I to regulate myself in construing the words which I have read? Beauchamp (Earl) v. Winn has been relied on by both sides as furnishing a principle of construction in favour of their respective contentions. Lord Coke says, in a passage which was cited in that case, that as the words stagnum

and gurgies pass the soil, "so it is of a forest, park, chase, vivary and warren on a man's own ground, by the grant of them, not only the privilege, but the land itself passes, for they are compound." Now it is to be observed that in this lease there is not the word "warren" sim-

pliciter, but the words are "warren of conies," and it is no doubt more difficult to construe the words "warren of conies," as passing the soil, than it is so to construe the word "warren" itself. Lord Colonsay made this observation:

"We have now to consider whether, as here introduced, it" (that is, the word "warren")

"did or did not carry the soil. If it was a name descriptive of a particular piece of land, and was so known as descriptive of that piece of land, it might

meaning that piece of land known as the coney

warren of Bromby. It would certainly carry the soil if the word 'land' had been introduced.

Such a term as 'that cow park,' or any other description of that kind, might carry a certain piece of soil, but it does not follow from that that a 'warren of conies' would carry it. That is a very different thing." And Lord O'Hagan in the same case said: "The authorities are very few, and seem to me to result clearly in this,

that the term 'warren' may, under certain circumstances, and in certain collocations, be held to pass the soil, and in others it may not." From these passages and from the whole of the case, I conclude that I ought to look at two things in the construction of this instrument. I must first inquire what was the ordinary meaning and

conies at Lakenheath" at the time when the instrument was executed, and for that purpose I must look at the antecedent usage in the neighbourhood among the persons who were concerned in or conversant with the property in question, and then I must undoubtedly look at the whole context and frame of the instrument in which

[JESSEL, M.R. said that he thought Boulcott v.

Winnill was a collusive action.—p. 132.]

JESSEL, M.R.—I was pressed very much with a judgment, which I conceive is not very well reported—of Holt, C.J.—in Bromfield v. Kirber.

... As I understand it, the L.C.J. there means to affirm that doctrine [that common of vicinage is confined to two commons]. He says: You cannot go into a third common. At all events,

I hold that to be the law, and it is so stated, as far as I am aware, in every book on the subject,

[5th ed. vol. iii. p. 71], who puts in the words

"or more," which seems to be copied into some of the text books. It appears to me that that is the true state of the law. There was great inconvenience about this common of vicinage, and

I conceive that there is no reason whatever for extending it. Then, again, there is another

sprang from a very old case in Dyer 47, sect. 18, upon which one judge said one thing and another judge said another; but still the dictum

of the one judge was adopted, and the dictum of the other judge was repudiated by the great text writers since; that is, that if you have three villages, each of which has a common, A., B. and C., and village B. lies between A. and C., village B. may intercommon either with A. or C., but with A. cannot intercommon with C. If that is the law, as I apprehend it is, it is quite clear that the end parish in this case could by no means intercommon with the parish at the other end (pp. 139, 140). . . . One cannot help seeing that these inclosures began after the decision . . . Boulcott v. Winnill, under the notion that if you bought up the rights of the Crown in the land so disafforested, there was an end to whatever right of common there had previously existed, and consequently the lord, in right of his soil, with the consent of his copyholders, who had other rights of common besides their right of pasturage, might inclose at his will and pleasure; and that, I think, has been the origin of the inclosures which have given rise to this suit.—p. 141.

CAMPBELL, L.C. said that great stress had been placed on Greathead v. Morley, and he did not desire to say that that case had not been well decided. It was unnecessary for him to do so, for he thought it clearly distinguishable. ESHER, M.R.—The leading case, in my opinion, as to the rule of construction of such Acts is that of Sowerby v. Smith, which is a decision of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with this Court; unless, therefore, there is something in the present case which prevents the application of the rule there laid down, the principles of the judgment in that case are binding upon us. . . . We have there a plain rule of construction, that inasmuch as the whole question depends upon the reservation clause, which is in derogation of the right of freehold given by the Act to the allottees of the land inclosed, that clause and any reservation contained in it must be construed most strictly against the lord of the manor. . . . Now is there any case which lays down a contrary rule? It is said that Leconfield (Lord) v. Dixon does so, and if that be so, we must say which of the two we agree with. If those cases are in conflict, it seems to me that the one lays down a clear and distinctly expressed rule of construction, whereas the other lays down no rule of construction at all, and I should, therefore, under such circumstances, prefer to follow Sowerby v. Smith. But if Leconfield (Lord) v. Dixon can be distinguished from Sowerby v. Smith, it ought, under such circumstances, to be distinguished. As to Leconfield (Lord) v. Dixon, I may say that if I had had to consider it after Sowerby v. Smith, and therefore to apply to it the rules of construction to be found in Sowerby v. Smith, I doubt whether I could have held that the reservation was sufficiently clear according to the rule laid down. But I do not desire to dissent from Leconfield (Lord) v. Dixon, which I think may be brought within the rule. . . . Now the words upon which the Ex. Ch. decided that case are not found in Sowerby v. Smith, nor are they to be found in the Act which we are now construing. I think, therefore, that Leconfield (Lord) v. Dixon may fairly be held to come within the class of cases in which the right, although not expressly reserved, is reserved by necessary implication, and that therefore it falls within one of the rules laid down in Sowerby v. Smith. As to Ewart v. Graham I entertain no doubt; although the right was not reserved in express terms, the language used raises a necessary implication of the reservation. . . . In that case the early case of Greathead v. Morley was considered, and the H. L. held that the decision in that case was not overruled; we must therefore consider the decision in Greathead v. Morley. Now, although in that case the rule is not laid down in such distinct terms as in Sowerby v. Smith, it seems to me that the same rule is in effect laid down,—pp. 473—476.

FRY, L.J.—I shall not advert to the authorities beyond saying that I adopt the conclusion arrived at in the Court of Ex. Ch. in Sowerby v. Smith, as laying down the law for us to follow. If there be a difference between that case and Leonfield (Lord) v. Dixon, I do not hesitate to say that I prefer the reasons and the views expressed in Sowerby v. Smith. I think that that case does lay down a very clear, intelligible, and reasonable rule of construction, which is prima facie the rule of construction to be applied to these Inclosure Acts. I may further say that Bruce v. Helliwell creates in my mind no difficulty: it is, I think, entirely consistent with the rule of construction laid down in Sowerby v. Smith.—p. 479. Eccroyd v. Coulthard [1898] 2 Ch. 358; 67 L. J. Ch. 458; 78 L. T. 702.—C.A.

LINDLEY, M.R.—Reference is made to Att. Gen. v. Hammer [(1858) 27 L. J. Ch. 837; 5 Jur. (N.S.) 693; 6 W. R. 804], in which it was decided that a Crown grant of minerals under the waste of the manor includes the minerals under the foreshore. I do not dissent from that case: but what we are dealing with is not a grant, but an Inclosure Act, and the idea is wholly new to me that it is the object of an Inclosure Act to deal with any property whatever, except property over which there are some common rights. . . . But the saving clause [in this case] unquestionably presents difficulties. It is not a new one. It has been commented upon and judicially expounded in Devonshire (Duke) v. O'Connor, where the C. A. held that a clause precisely the same as this in an Inclosure Act did not have the effect of preserving to the lord of the manor any rights which were merely territorial or incidental to his ownership over lands allotted, but only preserved manorial rights, or rights independent of those which he had formerly as owner of the soil. The right there in question was the lord's right of sporting over the waste of the manor. . . . I do not pause to criticise that decision. I accept it, and I am unable to draw any valid distinction between that case and this. I am unable to see any distinction material for the purpose of this decision between the right of shooting over the allotted land, and the right of landing and walking for fishing purposes over allotted land, and if one is not preserved by the saving clause I fail to see on what principle the other can be.—pp. 367—369.

WRIGHT, J.—This decision [Baring v. Abingdon] is said to have been impeached in effect by some observations of the M.R. in Ramsay v. Cruddas. But I think there is no inconsistency. The M.R. was dealing with the case of a copyholder, and the substance of his observations is that, where a man ceases to be a member of a class such as the copyholder of a manor, he ceases to have rights which belonged to him merely as a member of that class. That doctrine would apply to customary rights of copyholders as such to common within the manor, because their customary rights of common depend on the custom which applies only to copyholders. But it would not apply to common of pasture appendant to a freehold of the manor, because that common is incident to the land itself in the case of each freehold, and not incident to membership of the class of the freeholders of the manor. That was held in Dunraven (Lord) v. Llewellyn (1850) 19 L. J. Q. B. 388; 15 Q. B. 791.—Ex. Ch.—p. 653.

BRETT, L.J.—I cannot agree with the statement of the question by the M.R. in Sykes v. Beadon. He said that the point which he had to consider was whether there was an association or company formed for the purpose of gain either by the association or by the individual members thereof. But he omitted words which I think were purposely put into this statute for a definite object, namely, that the statute meant to deal, not with people who were associated together for the purpose of obtaining gain, but with people who were associated together for the purpose of carrying on a business having for its object the acquisition of gain. . . . As regards the Arthur Average Association, it is not perhaps absolutely necessary to determine whether the case of a mutual assurance association is within the statute or not, but I cannot help saying that the reasoning which brings me to the conclusion that the present case is not within the statute, appears to me to lead to the same conclusion with regard to a case of mutual insurance.—pp. 278—280. And see post, col. 383.

It was not a matter necessary to be decided in that case, as I took care to notice; but I took occasion then to express an inclination of opinion in that case which, after the full argument which I have heard to-day, I do not now maintain.—p. 352.

CAYE, J.—The main object of the society in Crowther v. Thorley was to buy freehold land and divide it amongst the members, and in my opinion the judgment proceeds upon the fact that the trustees carried on business in their own names and were themselves responsible. In this case the committee did not carry on business in their own name; they were appointed according to the rules of the society.—p. 337.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I do not propose to go into the details of this case, because I am of opinion that we are bound by the decision of the C. A. in Crowther v. Anderson, I possibly should not have entirely agreed with all that was decided in it. My views would to some extent have gone with those of the late Sir G. Jessel, whose decision was reversed. However, Smith v. Anderson stands, and also Crowther v. Thorley, which was decided by the other branch of this Court. . . . Mr. Byrne has evidently taken great pains in getting up the subject, and has not only drawn our attention very carefully to the nature and constitution of the association, and the rules by which it was governed, but to Smith v. Anderson, Crowther v. Thorley, and Wigfield v. Potter. It appears to me that Crowther v. Thorley approaches so closely in its circumstances to the circumstances of this case that, whatever may be my own private opinion as to the view which ought to be taken in this case, I am bound by that decision.—pp. 6, 7. NORTH, J.—The real difficulty I feel in Kay, J.'s decision is this. He says that the institution is not a joint-stock company, "because it is constituted by rules which do not permit of any dividend, division, or bonus among its members." Now it seems to me, with great deference, that is not a material matter. It is not of the essence of a joint-stock company that it should provide for a dividend or bonus among its members. The Act we are considering [Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854], does not refer to it. It says: "founded or established by the contributions of shareholders in the nature of a joint-stock company," and that the present company unquestionably was, though it is true the Bristol Athenæum was in the same way. . . . It seems to me, with great deference to the learned judge, that the test he applied . . . is one which cannot be sustained. . . . I have had the advantage of speaking to Stirling, J., who, I was told, had reserved judgment in a similar case [Jones, In re, (Clegg v. Ellison). See next case], and considering it with him. He and I both agree on the view I have expressed as to the meaning of the Act, and as to the decision upon which we have just been commenting—pp. 418—419.

STIRLING, J.—Upon this [sect 4 of Companies Act, 1862] it has been repeatedly held that associations of more than twenty persons may exist which do not require to be registered, and are not made illegal by the Act of 1862—see, for example, Smith v. Anderson, Crowther v. Thorley, and Siddall, In re (supra, col. 383). Yet it would be difficult, as I think, to deny to those associations the nature of joint stock companies. The Joint Stock Companies Registration Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110), applies only to joint stock companies established for the purpose of profit, and it was repeatedly held [see Reg. v. Whitmarsh, Bear and Bromley, and Moore v. Rawlins (supra, col. 381)] that associations which very closely resemble joint stock companies did not require registration under the Act. On behalf of the Att.-Gen., some observations of Kay, L.J. (then Kay, J.) in Bristol Athenæum, In re, were properly relied on. The actual decision in that case was that the Bristol Athenæum, an association possessing a constitution somewhat similar to that of the Sheffield society, could not be wound up as an unregistered company under sect. 199 of the Companies Act, 1862, and with it I do not differ. Incidentally, however, his lordship did express the opinion that the Bristol Athenæum was not a joint stock company, and therefore not within the provisions of sect. 30 of the Act of 1854. No one can feel more strongly than I do the weight due to anything which fell from that learned judge. Since this judgment was written, North, J. has in a case now pending before him [Russell Institution, In re (supra)] arrived independently at a similar conclusion with regard to the construction of sect. 30 as that which I have endeavoured to express.—p. 507.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—I confess I do not understand how the judgment of the C. A. in National Debenture, &c. Corporation, In re, can be reconciled with the decision of Lord Cairns in Peel's O.C.

Case (supra, col. 385). If I had to choose between the two decisions, I think that I should more readily follow that of Lord Cairns. . . . Fortunately, I am not placed in that position, but I wish to say, before I proceed to state how I intend to act, that as a matter of fact Peel's Case does not seem to have been cited to the C. A. in the argument in National Debenture, &c. Corporation, In re. That, perhaps, is not very important, because I cannot but think that a Court consisting of Lindley, Bowen and Kay, L.J.J., must have been familiar with that case, though it was not brought to their notice. In fact, Lindley, L.J. in his book on Companies (5th ed., p. 111) has given some attention to it, and I cannot but think that when he wrote his book he took a different view of the decision in that case from that which he took when giving judgment in National Debenture, &c. Corporation, In re. I do not, however, trouble about that, as the decision in National Debenture, &c. Corporation, In re, did not, in my opinion, determine the question which I have to determine now. In that case it was suggested that the memorandum of association had not been signed by the necessary seven persons. It was said that two of the signatures were not really the signatures of two different persons, but of one person who had signed twice, in two different names, so that the memorandum had really been signed by six, not by seven persons. The C. A., after hearing further evidence which was not before Kekewich, J., came to the conclusion that there was no ground for such a suggestion, and no difficulty arose as to the requisite number of persons having signed the memorandum. The Court, however, went on to decide this proposition of law, that the certificate of incorporation given by the registrar was not conclusive, so as to prevent any objection being taken on the ground that less than seven persons had in fact signed the memorandum, though the certificate had been given upon the assumption that seven persons had signed it . . . that question does not arise here. . . . I have heard nothing during the argument which makes me see why I should not hold that where an infant signs a memorandum of association, his signature is not the signature of a "person" within the meaning of sect. 6 of the Act of 1862. That was the ground of the decision of Hall, V.-C. in Nassau Phosphate Co., In re, . . . and upon that ground I decide this case.—pp. 669, 670.

COTTON, L.J.—The question there [Harrison v. Mexican Ry.] dealt with was the mere question of giving priority to the dividends payable to a certain class of shareholders. That is a matter which the Act does not require to be dealt with in the memorandum, and it was not dealt with in the memorandum in that case. But there is an expression of the M.R. which was much relied on, and which occasions some little difficulty: "If the memorandum of association is silent upon the subject of the terms of the original contract under which the company was formed, then there is an implied condition that all the holders of shares are entitled to rank equally as regards dividend, without any preference or priority between themselves; but if it does clearly appear upon the articles of association that that was not the meaning of the original contract, then there is no such implication of law as to the meaning of the memorandum of association, that implication being rebutted by the clear terms of the contemporaneous instrument." I think that there the M.R. was referring to matters which the Act does not require to be stated in the memorandum. But in reality it is not by implication from the construction of the memorandum that the equality of the shareholders as regards dividends arises, but by the implication which the law raises as between partners, unless their contract has provided the contrary. . . . I think that the M.R. did not intend to say anything which militates against my view of the law, though perhaps his observations require a little verbal correction.—p. 377.

BOWEN, L.J.—There is an essential difference between the memorandum and the articles. The memorandum contains the fundamental conditions upon which alone the company is allowed to be incorporated. They are conditions introduced for the benefit of the creditors, and the outside public, as well as of the shareholders. The articles of association are the internal regulations of the company. . . . Harrison v. Mexican Ry. was cited as showing that the M.R. was willing to read the two together, but the distinction is obvious that in that case the matter was one with which the creditors had no concern whatsoever.—p. 381.

LORD MACNAGHTEN—The practical result of the decision [Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co.] has been that, except in cases coming within the rule laid down in Harrison v. Mexican Ry.—a decision which has not met with universal acceptance—no company limited by shares that has not taken power by its memorandum to issue preference shares has been able to raise additional capital in the manner most advantageous to its shareholders and its creditors. It seems to me that the decision in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co. was not founded upon a sound view of the Companies Act, 1862, and I respectfully dissent from it. I have the less hesitation in expressing this opinion, because I find that Cotton, L.J. has disapproved of the chief ground on which the decision was based [Guinness v. Land Corporation of Ireland]. . . . Lindley, L.J. in a later case takes the same view. I agree that the equality of shareholders as regards dividends is not an implied condition of the memorandum. But I doubt whether it is necessary to have recourse to the doctrines of partnership.—p. 434. See also the other addresses at length. And see post, col. 389.

STIRLING, J. (after referring to Lord Macnaghten's judgment in British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper) said: The law, then, is that under an ordinary memorandum of association, according to which the capital of a company is divided into shares of equal amount, the interests of the shareholders must be equal in all respects. Whether a company so constituted can issue preference shares is a question the final decision of which has not yet been given, although, perhaps, in the
